What the Gas-Workers' Union and the Amalgamated Society of Engineers are, in fact, fighting for is not the right of workmen to combine with their fellows and sell their work as they please, but the right of a couple of committees to dictate to a large body of workmen what terms they will accept. The Gas-Workers' Union threaten a strike because a thousand workers have made a contract with the South Metropolitan Gas Company. This Company, arguing, as we take it, that it is worth while paying something in order to secure a permanent body of workmen, has offered very good terms as to share in profits and hours of work to those of its men who will make a yearly agreement. It is not denied that the terms are good terms. In fact, a thousand men have already accepted them. The Union, however, sees, and we do not think it sees wrong, that the yearly engagement and all it implies will seriously diminish its power over the men. It has therefore announced that it will call its men out, and as far as it can will suspend the lighting of South London, unless the Company not only tears up its agreement, but dismisses the thousand "blacklegs" who have accepted it. The Amalgamated Society of Engineers, again, does not like piece-work, and has announced that it also will call its men out unless this form of contract for labour is given up by the Maxim-Nordenfelt Company. It is not denied that many workmen are quite prepared to accept the Company's terms. Here, then, we have the wages dispute so-called in its crudest form. Two Unions are simply trying to dictate, not only to employers, but to a large body of workmen. It is to be noted that they talk of calling their men out much as a government might speak of summoning the Reservists. In all probability they are not exaggerating their powers. From recent experience it seems certain that the mass of workmen who belong to a Union have as completely forfeited their independence as the members of a secret society. They will obey their committee meekly, and will be prepared to intimidate those workmen who do not choose to submit easily to the dictation of this or the other "executive." It is a state of mind not peculiar to workmen. Political parties which hand their conscience over to revered leaders are in much the same state. So are Secretaries for the Home Department who cannot see the organized intimidation which is as clear as the sun at noonday, in some parts of the world, or Chief Commissioners of Police, who think it consistent with their duty to wait for a riot before recognizing the possibility of rioting. It is all a part of the nerveless cowardice of the time which reduces the rank and file to the moral condition of sheep, and makes distinguished persons run about begging every one who is threatened to surrender for the sake of peace, and be fleeced to spare their neighbours annoyance. In business it leaves us at the mercy of little committees, whose general intellectual faculty may be judged of by the pert self-sufficiency and cockney smartness of the Secretary of the Amalgamated Society of Engineers. The thing will work its own remedy, as other follies do, after it has caused immense loss of capital to employers, immense loss of wages to the employed, and immense damage to the general interests of the nation.

MR. GLADSTONE AT MANCHESTER.

IF there is ever an occasion when a certain disadvantage is felt by the controversialist who is unable to sink (in a rather felicitous phrase of the late Mr. MARK PATTISON'S) "below the level of average gentility and education," that occasion presents itself nowadays when Mr. GLADSTONE makes a "great" speech. The level of average gentility and education which we, at least, always endeavour to preserve enables us to expatiate upon that level in fancy, and to behold from its terrace in successive deeps a Tory Mr. LABOUCHERE, a Dissident-Liberal Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT, and a pack of Mr. PARNELL'S Yahoos turned Conservative, each dealing after their manner with the discourses delivered in the Free Trade Hall during the earlier part of the present week. We, for our part, cannot attempt to imitate such a style of controversy; and one of the most famous tags of the French stage, that about the "irreparable outrage of years," may dispense us from further endeavouring to conciliate truth and courtesy. It is a simple fact that, as in the Southport speech the other day, so in the Manchester speeches of this week, the oratorical presentation of the matter has almost nothing that can remind the reader even of the Atrocity speeches of thirteen years ago, much less of the addresses which succeeded Mr. GLADSTONE'S "unmuzzling" ten or twelve years earlier. To generous antagonists it must always be painful to behold such a spectacle, and to conscientious ones it must always be difficult to expose the futility of the argument without dwelling on the shortcomings of the presentation. But the "dotages" of Mr. GLADSTONE (we are simply adapting the words of no less a person than DRYDEN on no less a person than JONSON) have got to be dealt with as gently as duty will permit, as thoroughly as duty may demand.

Let us in beginning pay a compliment to Mr. GLADSTONE. Even he had to confess, and did confess, that he and his followers had perforce abstained for the most part from hostile criticism of the foreign policy of the present Government. Even he, in paying, as in duty bound, a tribute to the support of the only London newspaper of repute which abides by him, said little or nothing about Crete. Mr. GLADSTONE is ill informed about foreign politics, and his judgment is worse than his information; but even he must know, and evidently does know, that if ever charges were hopelessly shattered, those of the Daily News Correspondent's against the Turks in Crete have been. He must know that, whatever new evidence may turn up, the furnishers of this particular evidence are discredited in the eyes of every judge of evidence in Europe as either sheer fabricators or else persons who do not know the meaning of words. And, accordingly, though he would doubtless have liked to say much, he said practically nothing. Of Armenia he could say something, because, as has been pointed out here over and over again, the conduct of the Turks in Armenia and towards Armenia has been foolish in the extreme. But as to anything else he said little or nothing, and this is of itself a pretty strong testimony that he had little or nothing to say. As to the bye-elections, we may be excused from commenting much upon that subject. Mr. GLADSTONE has anticipated the effect of his own words in a magazine article, and, as a matter of fact, both he and his followers know thoroughly well that no inference of the slightest value this way nor that can be drawn from bye-elections, or from municipal elections, or from anything of the kind. We do not say this ourselves in any kind of exultation; for the "incalculableness" of the constituencies is a serious evil. But incalculable they are, and the results of a general election to-morrow, next year, three years hence, will depend partly on the questions which happen at the moment to be before the electorate, and partly on the work done in each more or less immediately before the day of election.

The real, however, or at least the main, interest of a speech of Mr. GLADSTONE's on such an occasion as this is the interest of seeing how much further on the downward road he will go. As JOAN OF ARC, in the play which unnecessarily sensitive persons think is not SHAKESPEARE's, offers "to lop a member off and give it" to the demon who is backward in assisting her, so Mr. GLADSTONE has constantly to make some fresh sacrifice of the kind. On the present occasion the sacrifice was handsome. Mr. GLADSTONE's attitude towards Scotch and Welsh Disestablishment has always been particularly interesting to students of his political peculiarities. To a person of what are believed to be (if he has any left) Mr. GLADSTONE's conscientious ecclesiastical and religious beliefs, Disestablishment in Scotland can per se offer no terrors. The Established Church of Scotland cannot be, in Mr. GLADSTONE's eyes, the true Church of that country, even if it is a true Church at all. But, on the other hand, he had a very large number, and still has a certain number, of devoted adherents who hold that the "Kirk" is a true Church, and the true Church of Scotland. Hence many hesitations. As to Wales Mr. GLADSTONE's hesitations have been much more recent and interesting, and even more easily explicable. The Church in Wales is a true Church, according to Mr. GLADSTONE, and he knows perfectly well that neither the recent arguments for Scotch nor the old arguments for Irish Disestablishment apply to it in the very least. Not only is there no such flaw of title as was urged in each of the other cases, but there is no rival body which actually stands even as the Free Kirk in Scotland does, much less as the Roman Catholic persuasion in Ireland did, towards the Establishment. In Wales the question is one merely and purely of political bargain. "Will so many persons give me their votes if I yield, and withhold them if I am staunch?" The calculations have satisfied Mr. GLADSTONE, and he has yielded. It is now time (though so short a time ago as the summer of this year it was not) "that Parliament should consider" whether it will pay the consideration necessary to keep the Welsh Nonconformists steady to Mr. GLADSTONE or whether it will not.

Yet Mr. GLADSTONE seems to have thought that this was all that could be expected from him. There was nothing about an Eight Hours Bill, nothing about the present meaning of Home Rule. The disappointment which his followers have in effect shown at his speeches, the apparent necessity which seems to have been felt for Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT to "drop in" and (without, of course, the least expectation that he should be called upon to make a speech, or intention of making one) doing a little "rousing" to counteract the deadly lively effect of his great leader's eloquence, the elaborate artifice of Sir JAMES KITSON to get a cheer out of the name GLADSTONE in a new collocation:—all these things, little and great, show the real effect of these Manchester addresses. We do not undervalue the enemy. Mr. GLADSTONE has behind him a very considerable party which has gained in recklessness what it has lost in brains. He is almost finally disembarassed from the necessity of addressing the reason of any of his followers, most of them not possessing that inconvenient faculty, while those who do have set it unreservedly at his disposal. He can appeal to "predatory instincts," to the love of destruction, to the natural willingness of those who have axes to grind to lend a hand to turn the grindstone. He can still command much of that personal devotion which, like all personal devotions, is scarcely intelligible to those who do not feel it. But it must, we think, be unquestionable now, if it was at all questionable before, that he has lost much of the chief motive power of all his former successes—the resistless rush of his discourse, and the inexhaustible ingenuity of his casuistry. The dreary kyrielle about Mitchelstown and MANDEVILLE, KINSELLA and Killeagh, faintly refreshed with a little Father McFADDEN, does not show the ebbing of the tide of force less than the verbiage about the elections and the juggling with social questions, on which no decided sound was given, show the loss of ingenuity. It would have been exceedingly strange if it had not been so; for, after all, the outrage of years is irreparable. But in that case why display it unnecessarily? It is in a way, no doubt, a wonderful thing to see a man all but eighty years old, who, with whatever loss of energy, has still energy enough to promise the overthrow of some of the institutions of his country, and, with whatever loss of astuteness, has still astuteness enough to avoid committing himself to the overthrow of more than seems necessary for the immediate purpose. But whether the spectacle is as reverend as it is wonderful is a question to which it would be painful, and is fortunately unnecessary, to give the obvious answer.

JUMBIES.

A NEW and attractive field for cocoa-growing and psychical research is the pleasant isle of Grenada within the Spanish Main. "Such a place for lougars, "I'll never see again," the Researcher may cry, as this agreeable West Indian possession. Mr. HESKETH BELL has written an amusing and rather rambling book on the subject, named Obeah (SAMPSON LOW), and has collected modern and ancient instances of high curiosity. We need not linger over the primeval Grenadan method of protecting property by dint of magic and spells. This is the only method that keeps QUASHEE's hands from picking and stealing plantains, but this plan is of no use with Socialists, as yet. When they have brought the general level of intellect down to QUASHEE's standard, then tabu, and ghostly serpents, and bags full of every kind of bones and shells will recover their magical efficacy. It is only a question of waiting. The crude magic of the Obeah men and women chiefly depends on the old sympathetic theory, the belief in the essential qualities of accidental analogies. A good deal of darker business is done in poisons, which seem to grow thickly in every tropical forest. Obeah men do a roaring trade. A friend of Mr. BELL's, a French Catholic priest, once recovered a great deal of gold coin from a hiding-place in the thatch of a dead conjurer, and, with a reluctant heart, sent the money to the Government, as the wizard had no heirs. But far more interesting than the gross, palpable frauds and foolish spells of these magicians are the extraordinary things which, in the opinion of the whites, they can really do. Now the beliefs of even educated Europeans easily "go Fantee" when settlers have lived long in the society of a superstitious race. We cannot rely on them to keep clear of native follies; but, on the other hand, some of the legends of the whites have a certain historical curiosity. Mr. SAVAGE, an American minister, has opened a discussion on "Spiritualism" in the Forum, and tells a few anecdotes of personal experience which are odd enough, and others which may be pretty easily explained on obvious natural principles. The most interesting are those in which Mr. SAVAGE, as he believes, was present at queer vagaries on the part of furniture and other inanimate objects. These jumped about as if possessed; and the stories of similar performances by dint of Obeah form part of the same imposition, or of similar phenomena. Mr. BELL's Catholic priest is responsible for the following example, though his anecdote, like "what the soldier said," is not evidence. He was sent by the Archbishop of Trinidad to take a parish in the interior of the island, and he was obliged to lodge in a small cottage, with an old Obeah woman and her little girl. It was hoped that he would, at least, make the old woman go to church. That was not exactly what happened. The lady lived in the "but" of the house, the priest in the "ben," and she could only come out into the open air by way of a door leading into the room of the holy man. Her own room was crowded with heavy articles of Creole furniture, such as "a tremendous four-poster and a portentous mahogany wardrobe." The priest went to bed on the first night of his tenancy, but was disturbed by a droning incantation which the witch kept chanting in her own room. At last he fell asleep; he slept well, rose, dressed, and never heard a sound from the old woman's room. A chair which he had set against her door was in situ; he knocked, no answer. He entered and found the room literally empty, swept and garnished. Old woman, child, four-poster, and all the rest of the "plenishing" had vanished, and never were seen or heard of more. The priest says no man could have moved the wardrobe, and the noise made in the "fitting" would have wakened the sleepers of Ephesus. The "but," the witch's room, had only two small windows. How was it done? The intelligent author of Dodo and I may say that witch, four-poster, and child, and wardrobe were all "disintegrated," and so disappeared, to be reconstructed elsewhere. That the priest was "hocussed," and slept sounder than he knew, or that the priest, like HERODOTUS's scribe with his "Kroph and Mophi," was amusing himself at Mr. BELL's expense, is the only orthodox explanation. But Mr. SAVAGE, in the Forum, may suggest a theory much more marvellous if he pleases. The old lady was a "psychic," who could make furniture jump.

A French Catholic priest—the same gentleman, we presume—told Mr. BELL another tale as odd. It was in Trinidad. A pair of planters were living in a small two-roomed house, "with no ceiling but the roof above them." They had been sitting outside till it was dark; when they entered stones were simply rained on them from above. The priest went with them, carrying a lantern. The light stopped the rain of stones; but when the wind blew it out they fell more heavily than ever. The moment that the light was kindled the shower ceased. They collected the stones, piled them outside, and went to sleep with the lantern burning. By way of experiment, the priest blew it out, and instantly the cataclysm of stones returned. The stones did not belong to the district. The following night saw the same game repeated, and then it ceased. Of course this sort of thing is familiar in stories like the "Devil of Glenluce," in SINCLAIR'S Satan's Invisible World Discovered (1681). The local explanation probably is that Jumbies did it, and, of course, Jumbies are Spooks. That QUASHEE did it, somehow, is more plausible; but why or how he did it, and why he left off, remains a mystery. Whoever the agent, his deeds are of the darkness. But he is nothing to the little girl in St. Lucia. One day her lady mother was told that it was raining in the little girl's bedroom. Raining it literally was! The floor was soaking, umbrellas had to be unfurled, and the shower followed the little child into the room where she was removed, while it ceased in her own room. She was taken into the garden, where rain was wanted. Nothing happened, but it (whatever it may have been) rained whenever she came under a roof. The attack only lasted for two or three days, and in this tale Mr. BELL emphatically "sees" Mr. SAVAGE, and "goes one better." Turning to history, he eclipses even his own marvels by a story of a witch, a captured negress, who stopped a ship in spite of the wind and performed many other miracles. Where is ROBERT ELSMERE now? He has only to read Nouveaux Voyages aux Isles d'Amérique, by the Père LABAT, and he will see that water-melons locked up in a box can yet be eaten by an Obeah woman or by the Jumbies at her command. She was set on shore; and then the ship went on all right, and people only ate melons in the usual way, not "with alien lips." The climate, scenery, and Jumbies of Grenada are, in short, so charming and satisfactory, and Obeah is such a pleasing alternative to strikes, that many will envy Mr. BELL his unrivalled opportunities.

THE SUFFERINGS OF THE WELSH CLERGY.

THREE letters written for the Guardian by Mr. PROTHERO have just been republished in pamphlet form. In this shape they may be had for a few pence, and they are a cheap, efficient aid to all who wish to understand the origin, character, and effect of a most unjust and cruel agitation.

The anti-tithe movement in Wales has its connexions with the Irish anti-rent conspiracy, but differs from it in several particulars. The Hibernian agitation was promoted by and has flourished upon a mixture of patriotic animosity and profit; the Welsh upon a combination of religious animosity and gain. Apart from original essentials, violence has been the chief characteristic of the one, cant of the other. There is no other considerable difference, though we might add that if the Irish agitation was spiced from the beginning with race-hatred, the Welsh movement has been inflamed by a heavy dram of political strong drink. It is very largely a Dissenting movement; and it is unhappily true—not of Wales alone, but of Wales especially—that Nonconformity has exchanged much of its old devotional fervours for political ardour and the bitterness of political partisanship. For the rest, the direct aim of the agitators was the same in both cases. The one preached the abolition of rent, the other preached the abolition of tithe dues; and tithe is rent under another name.

It appears, too, that in the case of the Welsh agitation the first impulse came from Ireland. Mr. DAVITT's concern for the nationalist and property tribulations of his fellow-countrymen is not so absorbing as to prevent him from stirring up strife elsewhere; and a few years ago he endeavoured to rouse gallant little Wales to rebellion on behalf of the three F's. He did not prosper much, having taken the wrong road to success. But native agitators knew of the better way that lay alongside of it, though it seems to have escaped Mr. DAVITT's observation. The Liberationists had long been at work with their propaganda of Disestablishment and Disendowment; and it was at once perceived that, though the proposed combination against rent failed, even when associated with heroic appeals to national sentiment, an attack on tithe-rent charges under cover of religious zeal would probably succeed. It was no miscalculation. The Welsh farmers were quite as willing as the Irish to keep back a part of their rent, when that excellent substitute for patriotic motive—religious scruple—was advanced to account for its retention. Besides, the Welsh agitation was begun during a spell of "hard times." Wales has long been, and is still, a prosperous country for agriculturists. No portion of the United Kingdom has been so little affected by agricultural "depression." Nevertheless, it was felt rather keenly in 1884-6; and, as Mr. PROTHERO tells us, the fall in prices was the opportunity of the agitators. Then the anti-tithe movement was pushed with such vigour that a spontaneous outburst of hostility to the extortions of an "alien church" (alien since when?) could soon be announced. But the spontaneity took some exertion to get it well aflame. The press, the Methodist pulpits, the chapel organizations, were all at work at once; being vigorously assisted by Board schoolmasters, deacon-farmers, and much-concerned small freeholders, and helped not only by itinerant agitators of the ordinary type, but by "house-to-house visitation by Calvinistic Methodist deacons." Local branches of the Anti-Tithe League were established, with the chapel, the politician, the preacher, the investor, and the vernacular press to sustain them. The investor, we have said, for it appears that "chapels in country districts are, in a certain sense of the words, commercial enterprises. That is to say, numbers of the farmers have invested their savings in them. To destroy the organization of the Church is to improve the value of investments which its continued progress threatens to depreciate." How should such an agitation fail to prosper? Prosper it did, favoured by political rancour, falling prices, private greed, immunity for lawlessness, the instigations of genuine religious sentiment (for of course that had something to do with it), the ignorance of many tithe-payers as to the ground of their obligations, and the helplessness of the victims of the agitation.

Before we look at the misery inflicted upon these unhappy men, let us glance at the excuse for its infliction. The excuse is religious or sectarian scruple, and a conscientious belief that tithes should be appropriated to common uses of religious teaching and general education. Well, the money being retained, how is it employed and what is its destination? The answer is that, withheld from the ministers of churches, it is not bestowed on the chapel ministers. It is kept in the pockets of the farmers themselves. "While they appropriate to their own use many thousands of pounds of money formerly devoted to a religious object, they permit the debt upon their chapels to rise from 246,926*l.* in 1878 to 323,118*l.* in 1886; and allow their contributions to the Nonconformist ministry, to the Nonconformist Missions, to the Nonconformist places of worship, and to the support of the Nonconformist poor

"to decline sensibly and materially." We may safely take Mr. PROTHERO's word for this, for he shows himself at all points a most careful and fair-minded inquirer. As for general education, take this in illustration:—A local grammar-school, supplying the very education to which the tithe is to be devoted upon the principle of nationalization, is asked for 25 per cent. reduction, while the local clergyman is only asked for 10 per cent. Besides, "lay" and clerical tithes are equally opposed. Radical laymen "are obliged to distrain as well as Welsh clergymen, "English colleges, or Ecclesiastical Commissioners."

Enough said on that point; and now let us turn to the effects of this most selfish and corrupt agitation on those who are made to suffer from it. Widespread misery is the result, and that of the keenest and most painful character. But perhaps the clergy have contributed to this unhappy result by hard insistence on their dues? It is not so, if what Mr. PROTHERO tells us be true; and his statements do not come before the world for the first time in this pamphlet. As a rule—indeed, it may be said almost universally—the clergy have shown themselves ready to consent to tithe reductions of from fifteen or twenty per cent. in some cases, in most to ten per cent., in others to seven, or six, or five. This has been done by men of whom few are blessed with private means, while most are poorly paid; and it has been done in favour of farmers who, "in numerous instances, could buy them up over and over again." The landlords have made no such reductions, taken generally. Out of their meagre pay the clergy have been willing to spare something, and not a little either, to meet the decline in prices which no longer afflicts their still obdurate debtors. But that did not satisfy; and tithe (which is that part of the rent that has to be paid to somebody who is not the landowner) has been withheld altogether to an enormous extent. To illustrate the losses which the clergy have been compelled to endure, Mr. PROTHERO prints a long table of instances, of which we take the first half-dozen (not the worst) for example:—

Tithe due last Audit				Tithes received
£101	9	3	...	...	£13	7	8
95	0	6	...	...	13	13	9
113	10	6	...	...	42	9	1

It has to be remembered, too, that in many cases "fixed" charges upon the living swallow up the greater part of "the money received, and with rates and taxes leave but a narrow margin." Thus one clergyman receives 86*l.* 10*s.*; of that, Queen Anne's Bounty Office takes 21*l.*, and rates and taxes consume nearly 28*l.* So goes the game, the clergy being reduced, not unseldom, to half-starvation. Mr. PROTHERO assures us—and we can see for ourselves how likely he is to speak the truth—that it is difficult to exaggerate the privations, the extreme destitution, the mental anxiety to which these poor gentlemen are reduced. He tells of one with whom he passed through the vicarage garden to see the church, a garden overgrown with weeds and branches of creepers. The vicar walked with difficulty, and, on the way, apologized for the condition of the path by saying, "We hoped to receive money enough to get it cleared," and for the slowness of his gait by the remark, "I really do not get enough to eat." Yet this man was at that very time arranging to hold additional weekday Mission services during the winter months. We read of another poor parson who scarcely ventured into the village because he felt so acutely his debts to the local shops; of another who sold his carpet to pay his way; of another whose son apologized for a hearty appetite, saying, "We have had no meat at home for weeks." Of yet another this tale is told. When he was already impoverished by sickness, his wife died. Ten days after, he was informed that there would be no more payment of tithe. He had no money left, and none was expected to come in. Food ran short. His two daughters, naturally delicate, fell ill from want of nourishment, and died. About this time "he received from his parishioners a box. On opening it, it was found to contain a collection of nameless filth," and on the top was placed the message, "We hear you are starving; here is food for you." That, however, must be taken as an occasional indulgence in ferocious cruelty, and counted for no more. Yet Mr. PROTHERO says that, stripped of its insulting savagery and its pathetic incidents, the story "accurately illustrates the condition to which the Welsh clergy are reduced." At best, and in the general, the condition of these poor clergymen is pitiable. Straitened for food and clothing, many of them find their credit exhausted and their friends overdrawn upon. Their boys have to be taken from school, their insurances have to be dropped, and some have succumbed altogether to sickness and anxiety.

But we can dwell no longer on a state of things which surely ought not to be allowed to continue, and the less as it proceeds altogether from organized lawlessness and absolute wrong-doing. As to the remedy, that, too, Mr. PROTHERO discusses; and we perceive that he is in favour of transferring direct liability for tithe rent-charges from occupiers to owners. That, we believe, is the solution which Lord SELBORNE's Committee favours; but, for reasons that appear in this pamphlet, it will not suffice alone. One thing is certain—distrain is no remedy. Distrain often costs more than the debt amounts to; and we can all understand how reluctant a clergyman must be to put it in operation.

THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

BY far the most interesting piece of American news is the report of the death of Mr. JEFFERSON DAVIS, which reached London yesterday. Since the death of General GRANT, the President of the Confederacy was the last survivor of the Civil War who could be described as having been in the first rank of the actors on that stage. Among them he was at one time the most conspicuous, and in any fair historical estimate he will always appear to have been one of the most honest and the most able. His death breaks the last link which even feebly connected the "un-inspired and uninspiring" American party politician of to-day with the political generation of CALHOUN, DANIEL WEBSTER, and HENRY CLAY.

In the present condition of American politics it is no dispraise of the PRESIDENT's Message that it should have attracted, as the telegrams report, "only moderate attention." The very great prosperity of the United States is not, as some Americans, at least, are aware, altogether unthreatened by possible dangers. It is hardly possible that another generation can pass before the position of the negro population in the South becomes a pressing difficulty. Already it is the cause, or the excuse, for acts of violence which are hardly to be paralleled in any other country with the most superficial claim to be considered civilized. The influence of the Irish vote in American politics is already a cause of trouble and discredit to the foreign relations of the Republic. Before long it also may become a domestic danger which it will no longer be possible to ignore. But Americans feel a profound confidence in the stability of their institutions, and are so little directly affected by the Federal Government, that they are, perhaps wisely, unwilling to do anything which would tend to hasten a crisis, even though they may believe it to be inevitable. As they enjoy complete immunity from external dangers, they can afford to be tranquil even in the actual presence of internal difficulties. Apart from the largely fictitious excitement of the Presidential election, they have little to interest them in political matters. As General HARRISON is as yet at the beginning of his term of office, he can afford to make his Messages insignificant. On the approach of the next election he may, perhaps, be advised to follow the example of his predecessor, and publish a Message which will, in fact, be a party manifesto. It would be a pure waste of trouble and ingenuity to do so now. His party do not want it, and his opponents might profit by it. Under these circumstances, the wisest course is to say as little as possible.

General HARRISON has said very little. His references to foreign affairs are characteristic. The brief mention of the recent Revolution in Brazil and the Pan-American Congress contains only an assurance that the United States Government will commit itself to nothing. Even the somewhat longer notice of the fishery dispute with Canada amounts in substance only to a similar assurance. To those who do not understand that foreign relations are of no interest to Americans, except in so far as they can be made use of for electoral purposes, there may be a certain absurdity in the comparison between President HARRISON's brief recognition of the friendly conduct of Canada, and the violent language used about a year ago by his present Secretary of State, Mr. BLAINE. In fact, however, the inconsistency is merely superficial. The fishery dispute was made much of just before the last presidential election, and it may become of value as the next approaches. In the interval the vast majority of Americans, who are not at all interested in it, will be content to see their Government leave it alone. Unless the British Government is induced by the Canadians and Columbians to press for a settlement, the PRESIDENT will be quite content during the next two years or so to acknowledge that "Canada has administered the fisheries during the past season with little friction," and to express a hope that all existing causes of difference "will soon be equitably adjusted." A harmless promise to do whatever is proper to help the Nicaraguan Canal, a polite salute to the Anti-Slavery Congress, and a cheerful assurance that difficulties in the naturalization of foreigners have now been removed, complete all the PRESIDENT had to say on foreign affairs. His recommendation that "the number of extraditable offences between Great Britain and the United States" should be increased belongs, except in the order of its appearance, to the domestic portion of the Message. It is not from this side of the water that the difficulties will come. Such a treaty as is about to be presented to the Senate would have been welcome enough to us, even if it had been of a character which would have deprived the United States of the valuable services of a diplomatist whom they have thought good enough to represent them at the capital of a sister American Republic.

The pith of the PRESIDENT's Message is in the passage which deals with the financial difficulty—the only really serious one which presses for immediate treatment in the States. Even this has no great gravity for the moment, and General HARRISON could afford to deal with it as to attract only moderate attention. The position of the State which has more money than it knows what to do with has its difficulties certainly, but they are not very troublesome. It is at least possible to let them stand over for a time; and that is, in substance, what the PRESIDENT asks Congress to do. The Federal Government has, or very shortly will have, on its hands a surplus of about twenty millions sterling. In spite of almost heroic increase of the pension-list, and in spite, too, of the lavish generosity which Congress-men have displayed towards themselves in the matter of pay and allowances, the excess of revenue over expenditure is still great in America. Something may be done by building a fleet of warships, and another fleet of steam-packets; something may still be done by continuing to grant pensions to all and sundry who had any share, however indirect, in the Civil War. But when all has been done in these ways which American politicians feel they can safely do—a surplus will still remain. It might be got rid of by a sufficiently large outlay on public works; on the construction, for instance, of the Nicaraguan Canal as a national undertaking. But, although Americans are far from averse to lavish outlay, this particular method of evacuation will hardly be permitted to the Federal Government. It would put far too much patronage into the hands of one party. In the present Congress the Democrats are too strong to allow the Republicans to hope to set up such an immense extension of the "machine." The redemption of debt has hitherto been a great resource, but now all that part of it which can be forcibly redeemed is extinguished. The remainder could only be wiped off by the purchase of shares in the market, a process which forces up their price. It is very doubtful, too, whether Americans, who understand as well as any people the value of an absolutely safe investment for trust and reserve money, wish to see the debt wholly redeemed. There remains, therefore, only what, at the first blush, looks like the easiest of all methods—the remission of taxation. As a matter of fact, however, it is about the most difficult of all in the United States. Two-thirds of the revenue is raised by Customs duties imposed for protective rather than for revenue purposes. They must not be touched by a Republican President who relies on the Protectionists. Of the internal revenue a large part is raised by excise on the distilling of spirits, and that could not be removed without creating considerable offence. The Federal Government is, therefore, burdened by a surplus which is a "disturbing element in business," but which it must not deal with on business principles. The PRESIDENT can hardly be said to have suggested any remedy, good or bad. He remits the question to Congress, and recommends a revision of the Customs Tariff, which is not, however, to affect its protective character. Obviously these are no resources at all. If the tariff is to remain protective, it will remain as it is. In all probability the immediate difficulty will be tided over by the remission of some internal taxation and further outlay on the navy. This is not a cure, only a palliative; but, after all, the disease is not of so painful a character that the United States cannot bear it for some time longer with equanimity. A thorough cure cannot, and will not, be tried until one party has a decisive superiority in Congress and a President of its own views. At present the forces are so evenly balanced that decisive action of any kind is not to be expected. For the same reason it is improbable that Congress will accept Mr. WINDOM's proposal to repeal the Bland Act. It is true that experience has shown that the compulsory coinage of silver serves no good end, and does not even keep up the price of the metal. But it does serve the interest of an active, resolute, and astute body of wirepullers, who will, in the conflict of authorities made possible by the American Constitution, be able to obstruct whatever they find inconvenient. We do not, therefore, expect to see Mr. WINDOM succeed easily with his Bill. Neither, however, do we expect to see the silver interest carry that "free coinage" Bill which would enable all debtors to pay their liabilities in a debased coinage.

THE PHILANTHROPIST ON THE WAR-PATH.

EVERYBODY seems to be agreed about the excellence of Dr. BARNARDO's motives, and what everybody seems to be agreed about is of course always true. Even the judges who are called upon not unfrequently to administer to the Doctor what Lord BRAMWELL would call a "good, sound habeas corpus" unite in testifying to the purity of his irregular proceedings. If we do not swell the chorus of adulation, it is not because we are prepared to charge Dr. BARNARDO with anything worse than wrongheaded obstinacy and concealment of the truth, but because Dr. BARNARDO gets at least as much flattery as is good for him. It is natural that people should be predisposed in favour of a man who keeps Homes for destitute children. Benevolence, however fussy, and charity, however intolerant, always appeal to those who are neither gods nor beasts. But, in the words of the novel quotation recently made by Mr. JOHN BURNS, evil is wrought by want of thought, as well as want of heart. In one of M. CHERBULIEZ's novels the hero accuses himself to his employer, a mine-owner, of having been the cause of a fatal explosion by not giving the proper directions for the safety of the mine. The accusation is false, and made to screen another person, but that is neither here nor there. The point is that the employer rejects with scorn, as a plea for mercy, the courage and assiduity of the supposed culprit in rescuing the imprisoned and helping the wounded after the accident had happened. "I did not engage you," he says in effect, "to perform prodigies of valour in an emergency, but to be ordinarily careful in the discharge of your duties." The remark was brutal enough, but it contained a substratum of truth. It may fairly be argued that the world would be better for less generosity and more justice. At all events, Dr. BARNARDO, as the Courts will soon be tired of telling him, cannot be allowed to break the law for the real or imaginary benefit of children whose parents are not altogether to his mind. Here, for instance, or rather not here, but probably in Canada, is HARRY GOSSAGE, whose mother wishes to send him to a Catholic home. Dr. BARNARDO is a Protestant, and the Church of Rome is, next to parental power, his darling aversion. Rather than subject HARRY to the danger of being perverted, he sent him out of the country and out of the jurisdiction of the Queen's Bench. He has been commanded to bring HARRY back, for the Court informs Dr. BARNARDO again, as it informed him before in another case, that he cannot say "I am unable to produce this boy, because I have caused him to be removed from England." A person improperly taken out of the jurisdiction must be restored to the jurisdiction, or else those responsible for his withdrawal must be prepared to face the consequences.

Dr. BARNARDO was perfectly justified in originally receiving HARRY GOSSAGE as an inmate of his home. He was asked to do so by a clergyman at Folkestone, and very properly asked leave of the boy's mother. Mrs. GOSSAGE replied, "I shall be pleased if my son is kept in Dr. BARNARDO's home, as I cannot afford to support him myself." Mrs. GOSSAGE is apparently unable to write, but to this sentence she affixed her mark. Dr. BARNARDO, who does not seem to be quite so innocent of the world and its ways as some of his acts would lead one to suppose, took the further precaution of sending her an agreement, but this agreement was never signed. A day or two after it was sent Dr. BARNARDO received an application on Mrs. GOSSAGE's behalf for the removal of her child to a Roman Catholic institution in the Harrow Road. Dr. BARNARDO's answer was a lithographed form of unctuous religiosity, in which he inserted no reference to the distinct demand made upon him. Whether Mrs. GOSSAGE could by agreement have divested herself of her maternal rights is not the question, for she signed no agreement. There can be no doubt whatever that she was legally entitled to recall HARRY from Dr. BARNARDO's, and send him wherever she pleased. But Dr. BARNARDO is a law unto himself. Two days after dispatching the lithographed form, instead of sending the lad to St. Vincent's or restoring him to his mother, he handed him over to a gentleman named NORTON, whom he had seen for the first time less than a week before, and of whom he knew absolutely nothing. Mr. NORTON produced a letter from Mr. BLAKE, and references from other less distinguished Canadians whose names Dr. BARNARDO has forgotten, and added that he "was anxious to find a nice-looking boy, not older than ten or eleven; one who was not likely to be interfered with by his relatives, as he wished, if he liked him, to adopt him as his son." It is almost incredible, but it is true, that Dr. BARNARDO gave Mr. NORTON the boy to do what he pleased with him then and there. He did not even ask for Mr. NORTON's address, and, when further applications were made on Mrs. GOSSAGE's account, she received answers from Dr. BARNARDO's subordinates which naturally led her to suppose that her son was still under Dr. BARNARDO's care. The mother's authority to keep the child had been revoked. Her authority to send the child away had never been given. Lord COLERIDGE and Lord Justice BOWEN have decided that Dr. BARNARDO broke the law of the land. They could not go further. But there are other laws than those made by judges or Parliaments; and it will be for the charitable public to consider whether Dr. BARNARDO deserves the confidence hitherto reposed in him.

CHURCH AND LAND IN WALES.

IT is not to be wondered at that Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT—a son of the prophets, a fair example of purely clerical origin and bringing up—should display his ancestral interest in ecclesiastical matters by making fun of what the Times not improperly calls the "very unlovely quarrel" between Welsh landlords and Welsh clergy, occurring, as that quarrel has done, just at the moment when Mr. GLADSTONE has made up his mind to throw the Welsh baby over the sledge. For some time past the probability of such a quarrel has seemed only too likely to those who know at once something of politics and something of human nature. The alliance between parson and squire is, indeed, one of those alliances which can only be unnaturally divorced; but it by no means follows that individual specimens of the two classes are incapable of wishing to dissolve it. That the main fault in the recent instance lies with the landlords there can be no doubt; but the clergy are not faultless. Great as have been their sufferings during the past year or two of Nonconformist dishonesty, and great as have been the efforts which the larger and better part of them have made to do their duty, it is probably true that in Wales, as elsewhere, and rather more than elsewhere, there have been and are clergy who do not do their duty. It has been over and over again confessed here, as it has been by all who are really attached to the Church of England, that one of the greatest blots on the discipline of the Church is the exceedingly slight hold given by the law over a clergyman who does not do his duty, and the expense, difficulty, and inadequacy of the means by which even that slight hold can be maintained. And, if it is particularly disgraceful for the castellan of a fort in a half-hostile country to be remiss, human nature, we are afraid, makes it very likely that just such a one will be remiss.

It is absurd, however, to recognize in the complaints of the recent Rhyl Conference a vera causa for the unwillingness of the landlords to acquiesce in the only solution of the tithe difficulty—the placing of the burden directly, instead of indirectly, on themselves. Some of them, indeed, seem to have quite frankly admitted the true reason, that they did not wish the bad relations now existing between tithe-owners and tithepayers to be transferred to themselves and their tenants. There would be nothing to be said against this exceedingly natural reluctance (or nothing except from the high moral standpoint which is not a convenient pou sto) if it were not as unwise as it is natural. Do any Welsh landlords really think that by abandoning the tenth to the tenants they will save the nine-tenths? Do they imagine that the eminent Mr. GEE and his friends will be content with mumbling the parson's bones, and will not think of fixing their jaws in the squire's flesh? Did they ever hear of a place called Ireland, of things called Land Acts, of prairie value, of holding the harvest, and so forth? Do they imagine that one kind of property in land can fall and another kind of property in land stand uninjured and unshaken by the falling? If they really think these things, the application of the old saw in their case is unpleasantly obvious. They must certainly have lost their wits, and they will go near to losing their goods. The blindness of property is, indeed, unfortunately a very well-known variety of blindness, and one of the most difficult to couch or cure. If the grumbling Welsh squires, who are no doubt not all the Welsh squires, do not want to exemplify the disease even more signally than their Irish brethren, let them agree speedily with their clerical allies. They are in the same boat with those allies, they cannot get out of it by throwing their companions overboard, and they will not lighten or quicken the boat itself by any such jettison. Parson and squire may sink or swim in England; but, will they nill they, they must sink or swim together.

TOY CAPS.

MANY people will remember the terrible explosion which occurred in the summer of last year at a manufactory of fireworks, near Wandsworth. Only a pound and a half of powder was ignited. But three girls were killed, and the neighbourhood was naturally a good deal alarmed. One result of the catastrophe was that Mr. McMURRAY, the well-known maker of paper—whose premises are on the other side of the Wandle—instituted legal proceedings against the exercise of this dangerous trade. Lord Justice BOWEN, in the interesting sketch of legal history which he contributed to Mr. HUMPHRY WARD's Jubilee volumes on the present reign, observes that, in 1837, the chances were against a man who began a Chancery suit living to see the end of it. We have considerably improved upon the pace of our ancestors. Lord ELDON has left no successor, and there are five Chancery judges. Aided by these positive and negative advantages, Mr. McMURRAY has succeeded in obtaining a judgment from the Court of First Instance within little more than a year and a quarter. As his opponent has only two appeals, and as the House of Lords sits for judicial purposes during the Parliamentary recess, Mr. McMURRAY need not despair of surviving the litigation upon which he has embarked. That he has so far succeeded may be partly due to the fact that he had Mr. RIGBY for his counsel. But the public will be very much inclined to congratulate him upon his success, without reference to how he won it. Mr. Justice KEKEWICH expressed some commiseration for the hard fate of the defendant, Mr. CALDWELL, and, no doubt, a man is to be pitied for having his trade molested, if not destroyed. Mr. CALDWELL produces fireworks, and also "amorces," or detonating paper-caps for children's pistols. He has obeyed the Regulations of the Home Office, which were altered and made more stringent after the explosion of August 1888. It may seem unfair to say anything against a man who carries on a lawful business in a legal way. Fireworks seem to be an acknowledged necessity of modern and civilized existence. But is it absolutely essential to our growth as a nation, or to the progress of mankind as a whole, that detonating paper-caps should be manufactured at all? What good object do they serve? They make a disagreeable noise. They emit an unpleasant smell. They corrupt the taste of the young and disturb the peace of the old. They lead to that insane passion for revolvers which threatens to become endemic if it be not extirpated by law. They yield no pretty or fantastic results, and are, if possible, less interesting than Pharaoh's Serpents. In short, they are an unmitigated nuisance.

Mr. Justice KEKEWICH, in one of those learned and elaborate judgments which, in their style, remind the flippant reader of a policeman's evidence, has come to the conclusion that Mr. CALDWELL's factory is, as DOGBERRY would say, "very tolerable, and not to be endured." So he has issued an injunction; and, unless his decision be reversed on appeal—as does sometimes happen—the defendant will have to discontinue his operations, or conduct them somewhere else. Where dangerous trades which are not prohibited ought to be located is a delicate and difficult question. There are not many waste and desolate places left in England, or at least in such parts of it as are possible centres of industry. But common sense, if not common law, would seem to suggest that paper and gunpowder are mutually unsuitable neighbours. Mr. McMURRAY is a very important personage, for he supplies much of the material from which the free press of this enlightened country is physically formed. Now fireworks may be all very well in their proper place. But even Messrs. BROCK would find their "pyrotechnic displays" less attractive and less profitable if there were no journals to give them a descriptive report. Mr. Justice KEKEWICH had, of course, to decide the case as between man and man, heedless of the consequences to the community in general. His parade of authorities is imposing and formidable. But the real point is whether this manufacture of caps and fireworks is dangerous to the plaintiff and his servants or no. As to this, there was, of course, the usual conflict of experts retained on either side. Mr. Justice KEKEWICH, extending the principle of GEORGE ELIOT's publican, thinks that all are right and all are wrong. Some say that the stuff of which caps are made is explosive when dry, but not when wet. Others hold that it is not explosive until it has been put into the cap, which certainly seems an odd view. Mr. Justice KEKEWICH, taking a middle course, which, in this instance, at all events, is the safest, opines that an explosive substance may be made suddenly explosive by hot weather. Now, as the QUEEN says in her Diary, we have no control over the weather, and therefore the only remedy is an injunction which applies to all seasons of the year alike. One thing which must strike the least scientific reader of the evidence is, that nobody knows the cause of the explosion fifteen months ago. The most plausible solution offered is described by Mr. Justice KEKEWICH as a "bad guess." These are not circumstances in which "it's better only guessing." On the contrary, if we cannot be sure, we should be on the safe side, like Mr. Justice KEKEWICH.

MARTIN FARQUHAR TUPPER.

WE are not so careful, as perhaps it might seem to some hasty ones that we should be, in noticing the death of the author of Proverbial Philosophy. We did our best many years ago to kill Mr. TUPPER as a standard and ensample of literary faith and manners; and we succeeded. He had to be killed, or sent, where bad English authors go when they die, to America; and the thing was done. We do not repent of it. As a man, Mr. TUPPER continued to live for a long time, and was a very excellent specimen of humanity. He ought, as far as the sale of his books went, to have been a millionaire, and he was very far from being that. He was justified by his earlier popularity in believing himself one of the first men of the day, and the general public for nearly a quarter of a century before his death altogether declined to treat him as such. Even while Proverbial Philosophy held its vogue, other work of Mr. TUPPER's was, unless we mistake strangely, anything but successful, and he was not one of those persons who trust in their vein and believe in their star and care nothing for recalcitrants and maligners. Yet we believe also that we are perfectly justified in saying that Mr. TUPPER was never in the least sour; that he never bated a jot of heart or hope; and that he was to the last genial. He came of excellent folk, whether the stern genealogist does or does not believe in the TOUPARDS and TOPHERRS, and all the rest of it. He was thoroughly well educated; he had the taste, if not the faculty, of letters. We salute him, as we have the right to do.

And yet there will always remain for the critic that astonishing problem of the popularity of Proverbial Philosophy. We call it, and we call it deliberately, astonishing; for, though it does not astonish the critic in kind (he has seen many others in that respect of it), no critic living has ever seen anything like it in degree. If, from the early forties to the early sixties (after which it "went with a run") it exasperated some critics beyond the bounds of fairness, and made them forget that it was not the guiltless Mr. TUPPER, but the guilty public, which was really to blame, that is a detail of the past. Perhaps some of these critics did forget one of the very axioms of criticism, that, from time to time, when the public has nothing better, it will jump like a trout at a mayfly at anything that is expressed in quasi-literary fashion, and goes just so little above its own head that the effort to seize it is a merely pleasurable exertion. Between 1840 and 1860, the era of Mr. TUPPER's greatest popularity, the public simply had not got a poet. The great race of the beginning of the century were dead or dying, or had long ceased to produce important verse. Mr. TENNYSON as he then was, and Mr. BROWNING as he still is, it declined to hear. It admired Sir HENRY TAYLOR because it was told it ought to do so, and so it ought; but Sir HENRY TAYLOR, it may be admitted, "do not," and did not, "over-stimulate." It admired, and no shame to it, Mr. LONGFELLOW; but he was a foreigner. Youthful Spasmodics it would none of, and here again small blame to it. The Defence of Guinevere, the morning star of a new poetry, came twenty years later than the first appearance of Proverbial Philosophy. Meanwhile there was Proverbial Philosophy. It looked like verse; it scanned (rather badly) like verse; they called it verse. Its sentiments were quite unexceptionable—indeed, to give our own unbiased opinion, there is more sound sense as well as more sound sentiment in it than in the whole year's production of the average minor bard to-day. "They thought it said what it ought to have said, and they coomed away," having, for the sake of the excellence of its saying, for the most part bought it. That the matter, even at its most excellent, was utterly commonplace, and the manner inexpressibly inartistic, the public did not, would not, perhaps could not, see. It is one of the most painful tasks of criticism, to any critic who is not a mere cub, to have from time to time to visit the idiocy of the public on the head of the author. The cub does it, and delights; the critic groans, and does it. It has got to be done now and then, be the author's name BLACKMORE or MONTGOMERY, TUPPER or FARRAR. What was Mr. TUPPER's abiding and distinguishing merit was, that whether he thought himself misjudged or not (and he would have been more or less than human if he had not), he took his punishment smiling, and if he never learnt, never whined.

ART, SCIENCE, AND "MY LORDS."

IF Professor HUXLEY and Sir HENRY LAYARD had laid their heads together to put officialdom to shame for its dealings, or rather its refusal to deal, with the needs of art and science, they could not well have performed that useful work more efficiently in concert than they have succeeded in doing by independent action. So happy, indeed, is the concurrence of their respective complaints, so fortunate the simultaneous publication of their two letters in the Times, that one is at first almost tempted to adopt the theory of a conspiracy of two. But, as a matter of fact, there is no ground for the suspicion. Professor HUXLEY writes, presumably in England, under date of December 4; Sir HENRY LAYARD's letter is dated Venice, November 30; and we may regard it as purely accidental that the protest of the one correspondent against the anticipated refusal of the Government to make proper provision for the new Science Museum, and of the other against their indisposition to complete the project of worthily housing our collection of national portraits, should both have met the eye of the public in the same day's impression of a newspaper.

The Commissioners for the Exhibition of 1851 have offered to the Government for 70,000*l.* a plot of land worth nearly three times that sum, on condition that it shall be permanently used for purposes connected with science and the arts. A purpose answering with remarkable accuracy to this description is and has been for some time past in official contemplation—the construction, namely, which is said to be at last sanctioned, of the Science Museum; to which might be added, if necessary, the enlargement of the Normal School of Science, at present compelled, as Professor HUXLEY points out, "to turn away many applicants for admission every year." Yet, with this land offered to them on these handsome terms for a scientific purpose, and with their scientific purpose imperatively demanding the purchase of land for its execution, the Government are minded, it is said, to refuse the offer, preferring, it is supposed, to patch up the old Exhibition building into a poverty-stricken Science Museum, and to allow the erection, as a vis-à-vis to the Imperial Institute, of a series of "desirable family mansions" in the best possible position from which to discharge "red-hot flakes of soot," whenever their chimneys happen to catch fire, upon a museum containing "thousands of gallons of proof spirit" in the "preparations" which form a considerable portion of its specimens.

Sir HENRY LAYARD's protest, however, relates to a piece of official parsimony—not, we are glad to be able to hope, in actual contemplation—which it would have been even more difficult to regard with patience. There is, as is known, a small plot of ground adjoining the site of the proposed addition to the National Gallery, the possession of which the architect declares to be absolutely necessary before he can proceed with his plans. Not to acquire it would be to run a double risk. A building might be erected upon it which would seriously obstruct the light in the new galleries, or one which it might not be desirable to have in their immediate vicinity. It was to be supposed that the Treasury, after having been by the munificence of a private benefactor relieved of the cost of erecting the new National Portrait Gallery, would not hesitate in taking steps to secure to the nation the fullest advantage derivable from this public-spirited offer by purchasing the plot of ground in question. The sum required to do so would not be large; it amounts only to 7,000*l.* Sir HENRY LAYARD, however, had been informed that, "out of parsimony," the Treasury declines to advance the money; while, on the other hand, the London County Council refuses, and no doubt very properly, to have anything to do with what it considers, and what, in fact, is, an Imperial and not a municipal improvement. The unfortunate Portrait Gallery, therefore, was thus likely, he feared, "to fall between two stools," "unless a strong expression of public opinion may induce the Treasury to reconsider its decision." It is with satisfaction that the public have learned from Mr. PRIMROSE's subsequent letter of explanation that this pressure will not be necessary, and that the land will be acquired. In no case, of course, could Sir HENRY LAYARD's worst fears have been realized by the project of the National Portrait Gallery falling to the ground. The building having been promised as a gift to the nation, an eligible site will, of course, have to be found for it somewhere. But no site could be more eligible than the one proposed; and from the first it seemed incredible that, for lack of such a trifle as 7,000*l.*, it should have to be exchanged for a less suitable one. We have all heard of throwing away the ship for a halfpennyworth of tar; but to do this with a ship which has been presented to you free of cost would be an ineptitude of which even "My Lords" are not yet proved capable.

BOURKE v. DAVIS.

THE sympathies of the man who is not a riparian owner are naturally against the man who is when he endeavours to keep a river running through his land for his own delectation. If the river ever has been used, even only a little, as a place of amusement by the boating-men, then the action of the owner who suddenly exercises his power to shut out strangers is apt to look odious indeed. And yet the owner may be right. Mr. Justice KAY has, after taking several days to think of it, decided that the Hon. HENRY NORTON BOURKE is entitled to put a stop to the hiring of pleasure-boats on the river Mole. A certain amount of use has been made of that water for purposes of recreation; but the judge has decided that it was only by sufferance on the part of the riparian owner, and that he was entitled to cease tolerating trespass on his river if he chose to do so. However unpleasant it may be to learn that a very pretty stretch of water within reach of London is shut to all those who do not enjoy Mr. BOURKE's permission to row on it, we think that reasonable boating-men will allow Mr. Justice KAY to be in the right. Not that their approval matters to Mr. Justice KAY. It will, however, be for their own peace of mind and edification to realize the grounds on which Mr. BOURKE's claim is upheld. Whether the reader of Mr. Justice KAY's judgment is also bound to believe with him that a Commissioner for the Administration of Oaths ought to see that those who take them know what they are swearing to is not to us equally clear. After all, the Commissioner's business may be plausibly held to be only to administer the oath, not to assure himself that it is not taken in ignorance or dishonesty. The sin and the risk of that should rest with him who swears.

Mr. BOURKE's right to warn the holiday-maker off the Mole is based on the rule that a man is entitled to what he has paid for. In this country a purchaser can acquire the right to keep a piece of water to himself, provided it is not a tidal river or a highway from one public place to another. When Mr. BOURKE first began his endeavour to stop the letting of pleasure-boats on the river by Mr. DAVIS of Helsham, he had not acquired all rights over the river, and for that oversight he will suffer in his bill of costs. He has since put himself right by purchasing the bed of the river from Cobham to Esher, from those who had power to sell it, and is therefore entitled to put obstructions in the way of Mr. DAVIS's boats. The only grounds on which he could be debarred from doing so would be that the river is tidal, or that it has been used as a highway. The first contention is absurd to any one who has an elementary knowledge of the geography of the Thames Valley. The second was shown to be unfounded by the evidence. The part of the Mole which was asserted to be a highway neither starts from nor ends in a public place. It has never been used for purposes of carriage, except on a very few occasions, when owners on either bank found it convenient for the purpose of floating bricks or poles. That is not traffic. In fact, the Mole is so little of a highway that it owes its character as navigable water entirely to dams erected by millowners. As Mr. Justice KAY said, it is a long artificial pond, and if it had been left in a state of nature would be a succession of pools connected by a mere thread of stream. The attempt to prove that such a piece of water is a highway only shows on what desperately small pretexts men will fight in law courts. It is exceedingly probable that to many people Mr. BOURKE will seem to have played the part of dog in the manger; but, even if he had, it would not follow that he was not thoroughly entitled to the judgment he has obtained. As long as the law allows a man to acquire certain rights, it must enforce them. The law does allow Mr. BOURKE to acquire those rights for which he has paid, and the rest follows. Moreover, although it may be a good thing that places of recreation should exist near great cities, it is not an equally good thing to live near those places of recreation. The state of certain parts of the Thames on a Sunday may well have appeared a warning to the riparian owners of the Mole. If they, or the most spirited of them, availed themselves of their rights to prevent Mr. DAVIS, of Helsham, from turning their quiet water into a small copy of what the main river is at times at Hampton Court, we do not know that they are to be blamed.

THE WRONGS OF MOLLOY.

HOW is it that Miss HELEN TAYLOR and her sisterhood of itinerant Home Rule prælectresses have overlooked the case of the persecuted MOLLOY? It is simply perfect; a monumental instance of landlord rapacity and of the sufferings of a fleeced and face-ground tenantry. The account of the case in Mr. GEORGE WYNDHAM's letter to Mr. BANNISTER, all simply told as it is, is touching in the extreme. MOLLOY, who is a tenant on Lord KENMARE's estate, owed 30*l.* rent and arrears—a fact alone sufficient to prove that he is a wronged and cruelly entreated man. To him thus in default enter the estate bailiffs, who first seized his cows—for pecus, it seems, he had, though not pecunia—and then, having taken this heartless advantage of him, called again at his home to ask him if (that such things should be!) he would redeem them by paying the debt. MOLLOY replied that he was willing to pay—and where is the Irish tenant who is not?—but that he had only 7*l.* altogether, wherewith he handed seven notes, by way of cessio bonorum, to the bailiff. And now a strange thing happened. On examining the tender, the bailiff found that one of the 1*l.* notes was, to employ a local idiom, a 5*l.* note; so that the account between MOLLOY and his landlord, instead of having been reduced by 7*l.*, had, in fact, been diminished by 6 + 5 = 11 (say eleven) pounds. It is much to MOLLOY's credit, and demonstrates the inbred honesty of the Irish nature, that he made no demand for the return of the 5*l.* note, though it was obviously a payment made under a mistake of fact, and might surely have been regarded, in contemplation of law, as money received by the bailiff to MOLLOY's "use." So far, however, from being impressed by his moderation, the agrarian SHYLOCK was apparently only emboldened by it to give another turn to the screw, and he accordingly proceeded to put further pressure on the tenant to pay the balance of the debt.

It is to be supposed that MOLLOY's spirit was at last broken under this system of moral torture; for he now admitted that he had a small deposit of 20*l.* in the bank, and produced a document which he said was the deposit receipt for that sum. This paper he handed to the bailiff; and here another strange thing happened. On the receipt being examined, it proved to be one, not for 20*l.*, but for 100*l.* The mistake was pointed out to him, and, taking back the document, he produced another; but neither was this the receipt for which he was in search. Wonders, to use another local idiom, had "never done ceasing" in connexion with MOLLOY and his assets; for this second receipt turned out to be one for 40*l.* The quest of the 20*l.* voucher was, however, continued, and was at last successful; and with this and 10*l.* in notes the victim of landlordism paid his rent. Every man with a heart to feel for another must sympathize with the story of his wrongs; but still they have their compensations. It must have been, after all, a relief to him to find himself solvent, instead of, as he had imagined, bankrupt. A glance at his balance-sheet at the conclusion of his interview with the bailiff, and a comparison of it with his former estimate, will show how different was his position to what he had supposed. At the commencement of the interview the account stood thus:—Liabilities, 30*l.* rent and arrears; assets, 7*l.* At its close we have the following figures in this second column:—By cash, 11*l.*; on deposit account, 100*l.*, 40*l.*, 20*l.* Total, 171*l.* Balance, after discharge of all liabilities, 141*l.* This is certainly better than bankruptcy; and, after all, it is better to be solvent and oppressed than to be insolvent and ditto. Still his case, however we look at it, is a hard one, and Miss HELEN TAYLOR might have made much of it, if it had been brought to her notice. We cannot help thinking that these ladies are not being well served by the persons to whom they look for information on the wrongs of Irish tenants.

MR. BALFOUR AT GLASGOW AND EDINBURGH.

MR. BALFOUR, who has been virtually replying to Mr. GLADSTONE throughout the week, has, in one important respect, had less to answer than usual. Hitherto it has commonly fallen to his lot, not only to repel unjust and slanderous attacks upon the methods of his Irish administration, but also to correct the grossest misdescription of its results. On the present occasion he has found himself spared at least one-half of his customary task. Mr. GLADSTONE is unexpectedly, and as we believe almost inadvertently, "with him" as regards one of the two contentions which it is as usual his duty to support. When he declares, as he has declared before, that law "has been restored in Ireland, and can be maintained," that "contentment will follow, and is following the wake of the law," his declaration is, wonderful to relate, at last echoed by the leader of the Opposition, who, much to the inconvenience of his followers, has admitted that "the state of Ireland generally is tranquil and happy, and the law respected and obeyed." It is unnecessary, of course, to add that Mr. GLADSTONE allows no credit for this to Mr. BALFOUR; but that is a minor matter. He is at liberty to explain the encouraging circumstance in his own way; those who recognize ordinary sequences of cause and effect will interpret it in theirs. The great point is that the fact should have been admitted, as it now has been for the first time, we believe, by both parties to the dispute; and that while the Government have steadily prosecuted their administrative policy in Ireland, in the face of all the calumny and obstruction which their opponents have brought to bear upon it, the condition of the country should, either as a result of that policy, or, if Mr. GLADSTONE prefers that belief, by a fortunate coincidence, have continued as steadily to improve. There may possibly be only a mysterious sort of pre-established harmony between the resolute enforcement of the law on the part of the ruler and the respect and obedience which are now admittedly paid and rendered to it on the part of the ruled. But, even if that be all, it will be worth the while of the Government to persevere with the experiment, if only in the hope that the same inexplicable concurrence of firm administration with re-established tranquillity and reviving prosperity may continue.

No verbal answer, however, that Mr. BALFOUR could give to Mr. GLADSTONE is likely to produce half so great an effect on the public mind, not to say on the mind of his vehement opponent himself, as the reception which has been accorded to the CHIEF SECRETARY in Mr. GLADSTONE's own constituency. To Gladstonians, to whom it apparently gives an actual sense of virtuous self-satisfaction to count the number of people who assemble to hear their "illustrious leader" or stare at him when they cannot hear him, it will come, we have no doubt, with something like a pang to hear that at the banquet at which Mr. BALFOUR was entertained last Wednesday in the Waverley Market, "covers were laid for 2,700 persons." This, we imagine, must have beaten the Gladstonian record in banquets altogether, and since it seems to be purely largeness of scale in political demonstrations which inspires them with hope and confidence of future victory, we should not wonder if some of their meteorologists were to feel uneasy until arrangements have been made for Mr. GLADSTONE to sit down to a political dinner at which covers have been laid for 3,000 persons. Meanwhile, however, they can console themselves with the reflection, never likely to be denied them, that if Mr. BALFOUR is fêted by some hundreds or thousands more persons than Mr. GLADSTONE, Mr. GLADSTONE, on the other hand, may always be trusted to address some thousands of words more to them than Mr. BALFOUR. The CHIEF SECRETARY's speech last Wednesday cannot bear comparison in point of length with even a Gladstonian oration of the second magnitude; but, on the other hand, we may say of it, what cannot be said with strict accuracy of the famous discourses just referred to, that it did not contain a superfluous word. The case for Home Rule after the type of Mr. GLADSTONE's Bill of 1886—that is to say, after the type of the Home Rule which was tried and found wanting by the Irish themselves before the demand for the Parliament abolished by the Union arose at all—has never perhaps been more tersely exposed and so effectively disposed of. Home Rule, in fact, defined as Mr. BALFOUR defines it—namely, as a system under which a legislative assembly manages the affairs of a country without being, like our own Parliament, supreme—is not, as Mr. GLADSTONE led the more ignorant of his followers to suppose, and perhaps, till he took up Irish history, himself believed, the name of a new and hopeful experiment in Irish politics, or even of the renewal of an experiment which, though tried once before, was tried for too short a time and under too unfavourable conditions to justify us in drawing any desponding inferences from its failure. No; it is the name of neither of these things. It describes a system which endured for generations; which was overthrown, as Mr. BALFOUR says, by one of the few "unanimous movements" in which the Irish nation ever indulged; and which was replaced, in the name of those very principles which Mr. PARNELL pretends (when he is not speaking at Cincinnati) to repudiate, by the Parliament abolished in 1800. The Legislature which Mr. GLADSTONE sought to establish in Ireland three years ago was, in substance and in essentials, the same Legislature which the country possessed before 1782, and which Irish patriotism of that day declared to be absolutely unworthy the toleration of a free people. What GRATTAN and his colleagues of that day maintained, as Mr. BALFOUR reminds us, was that the exclusive and absolute power to make laws to bind Ireland should reside in the Irish Parliament, and he rejected the "Home Rule" Parliament then in existence as savouring of slavery. When, therefore, Mr. GLADSTONE and his followers talk of contenting Ireland with a Parliament which is to be strictly controlled by that of England, and when they insist that there is no danger of Ireland seeking to raise her Legislature to a dangerous independence, the short answer to them in both these points is, that the concession which they say will content Irish nationality has once already in their history been denounced by them as insultingly inadequate, and that the attempt at its illicit extension, which they declare unlikely to be made by Irish Nationalists, is exactly what historical experience bids us expect from them. It is owing, we suppose, to Mr. BALFOUR's having put this destructive argument in so telling a form, that the Freeman's Journal has been driven to such a delirium of fury as to mistake itself for United Ireland.

English Parnellite organs have with more judgment and self-command confined themselves to the discovery that Mr. BALFOUR's first Edinburgh speech was "dull." It could hardly have surprised us if the second speech, which closely followed the lines of Mr. GLADSTONE's amazingly dreary discourse at Manchester last Tuesday night, had been really obnoxious to this unfavourable criticism. But, as a matter of fact, it was as full of spirit and vivacity as one of the best of Mr. BALFOUR's Parliamentary "replies"; and, though it seems much to say of a performance which Mr. BALFOUR has now been compelled to repeat for about the twentieth time, we are inclined to think that he has never before put the démenti of Gladstonian mendacities on the subject of the Crimes Act, and its employment solely against "combinations" which would be lawful in England, in so final a form. The answer to Mr. GLADSTONE is certainly most compactly given in the following three propositions:—

(1) The Crimes Act of 1887 is not directed specially against "combinations" at all, whereas Mr. GLADSTONE's Crimes Act of 1882 (as witness the recitals of its preamble) was;

(2) The Crimes Act of 1887 has not been mainly, but on the contrary, relatively speaking, rarely employed against criminal "combinations," four-sixths of the cases which have come under it being cases altogether outside this class of offence; and

(3) The Crimes Act of 1887, which Mr. GLADSTONE declares to be directed against combinations lawful in England, actually contains a clause providing that anything legal under the English Trades-Union Acts shall remain legal, in spite of anything in its provisions contained; while his alternative charge that, whether so directed or not, it has been so employed, is answered by the fact that in no single instance, before resident magistrate, County Court judge, or Division of High Court, has counsel for an accused ever attempted to set up this protective clause of the Act, and to contend that the defendant was only doing that which may be lawfully done in England.

If these three plain answers to three deliberate falsehoods cannot be got into the heads of the electors of Great Britain between now and the next election, there will indeed be reason to despair of the future of the country. If they can be got into these heads, and it is the duty of Unionists to spare no pains to ensure success to the trepanning operation, then there will indeed be some hope of bringing home, even to the slowest-minded among them, the perception that the political party which works by such means as these cannot for a moment be trusted to give a true and honest account of its political ends.

THE EGYPTIAN COLLECTION AT THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

AS an example of the influence of arrangement on the usefulness of a museum some changes should be noted which are being carried out in one department at Bloomsbury. It is the more desirable that these changes should be described here because on previous occasions we have ventured to call attention to the heterogeneous character of the Egyptian collections in the British Museum. There were, no doubt, great difficulties to contend with. The space at command was much too limited, for one thing; and another drawback existed in the fact that a large part of the objects exhibited were brought home before Egyptian chronology was understood, and before antiquaries at all recognized the necessity of noting what the French call the provenance of each thing. Sir Gardiner Wilkinson and his contemporaries had no conception of the immense space of time which divided certain Egyptian dynasties. They were unaware that the manners and customs, the religion, the language, and the manufactures of the Pyramid-builders were wholly different from those of the Ptolemies. To their minds, as we have more than once had occasion to observe, the term "Ancient Egyptian" referred equally to every people, nation, and language that had inhabited the Nile Valley between the reign of Menes and that of Cleopatra. They could not, or did not, recognize the fact that thirty dynasties imply a considerable number of centuries; and that, although there are strong points of resemblance between the first Egyptians and the last, it is not in the nature of things that any country can stand absolutely still for three thousand years or more. In short, they did not recognize the existence of those three thousand years. Some of the most expert of the Egyptologists of forty or fifty years ago, some who could read hieroglyphics very fairly, stumbled at this point, and wrote great books like those of Sharpe and of Osburn to show that the three rows of kings in such a list as that of Abydos were contemporaries, not even perceiving that the latest of them must have reigned before the time of Moses. Collections made by this school form, nevertheless, the bulk of what the British Museum contains, and naturally, up to about twenty years ago no attempt was made to discriminate. Fortunately for us of the present day a variety of circumstances have co-operated to make a classification, in many instances, possible. First of all, the removal of the beasts and creeping things to South Kensington gave the Egyptian department all the outer rooms but one in the north wing, and that one has since been ceded by the removal of some Etruscan terra cottas to a more appropriate situation. Another change is implied in the great improvement in scholarship which has lately taken place. A smattering of hieroglyphics is by no means the rarity it used to be, and, whereas it used to be said at the death of Deveria that no one survived who could read hieratic, there are now several fluent readers in the Museum alone. A third circumstance is the better knowledge of the arts of different periods. Although the older collectors so often forgot to mark whence they obtained a vase, or a bead, or a Ushabti figure, the modern arranger can tell by the glaze and the colour to what epoch each belongs, and in many cases where it was found.

The first necessity at Bloomsbury was a careful revision of the labels, and a reduction of the number of unlabelled objects, which at one time was very large. Although the general public knew nothing about it, a very important and difficult piece of work was being silently carried on. The collection of writings on papyrus was specially mounted in glass frames, appropriately labelled and placed in a series of cases where they are readily accessible, the result, which includes even the latest "Budge Papyrus," acquired last year, showing that in this one department our National Museum, in hieroglyphic, hieratic, and demotic documents, is second to no other in the world. Since this great task was accomplished, the officers of the Department of Oriental Antiquities—for it is almost incredible, yet strictly true, that England cannot afford a separate Egyptian Department—have been hard at work to take advantage of the extension of space to which we have referred.

Recognizing that, apart from the great Temple relics in the large galleries below stairs, all the smaller objects are of a funereal character, and that almost all we know of the successive periods of ancient Egyptian history is gathered from the tombs rather than from the temples, the authorities set about the rearrangement of the mummies first, placing them, where they should be, in the first room, and, in what had never been attempted before, chronological order. The result is really startling. No one knew what treasures we possessed. Here, at the head of the row, is that venerable fragment the wooden coffin of Mycerinus, inscribed with the touching prayer to earth and sky which gives us our earliest information as to the religious tenets of the Pyramid-builders. Close by is the skeleton of the same king—for he lived before the embalming of bodies was understood. How long ago that was we may ask in vain. Mariette would have had us believe that the Fourth Dynasty, of which Men-ka-u-Ra was the third king, ruled the land of Kemi between 4200 B.C. and 3900. Between this and the next great historical relic there is a long interval, though Antef, of the Eleventh Dynasty, also lived before any certain chronology can be established, and was placed by the same authority about 3000 B.C. Here we have a gorgeous mummy, rich in ornament and gilding, and bearing a fragment of what is known as the Pyramid text. Adjoining the remains of these two kings are the coffins of two priests of their respective periods—that of Amamu, showing us a fine example of the oldest hieroglyphics; and the later one of Mentuhetep, exhibiting the change that in even so short a time as nine centuries had come over Egyptian art. Next in order we have the handsome mummy-cases of the Eighteenth Dynasty and later, until we have exhausted the whole of the first room, ending with the curious coffin-lid of one Cornelius, who died about A.D. 110. The second room contains a few more mummy-cases, being chiefly those found by Mr. Petrie in the Fayoum, of a date as late as the end of the fourth century. Among these we observe with pleasure the remarkable scarlet and gold coffin of Artemidorus, with its life-like portrait, which excited so much interest when it was exhibited last year at the Egyptian Hall. There are other examples of Mr. Petrie's discoveries here, as well as the granite column below stairs with the names of Rameses II. and Osorkon.

The rest of the second room, all that so far has been rearranged, contains examples of deposits in tombs, such as Ushabti figures, canopic jars, and a small collection of typical skulls. From these last and other collections, such as that at Cambridge, the place among the nations of the ancient Egyptian has at length been settled. The conquering race which colonized the Nile valley so many thousands of years ago, perhaps under Osiris and Horus, came from the great central highlands of Asia, and may have brought with them much of that marvellous civilization which, the further back our researches extend, appears more and more perfect, and shows no signs of growth from any primitive era of barbarism. The Ushabti figures are very numerous, some being in stone, some in wood, some in beautifully glazed pottery. These last seem almost to arrange themselves; the best blue glaze being older than the tenth century B.C.; the brown coming next, and some pale green specimens dating from about 800 B.C. down. These figures are many hundreds in number, and the labour of merely labelling them must have been immense. In themselves they form a dictionary of names like that of Lieblein. Near them are the canopic jars which were placed with every coffin in the middle and late periods, and bear the heads of the hawk, the jackal, the ape, and the human genius. Some of these are of wood, and among them some, evidently made for a cheap funeral, are solid, and have no interior cavity. These are among the curiosities of the collection, but the taste of the public in this respect has been amply respected. Here is the hand of the thin-fingered lady still wearing its handsome gold ring set with a scarab. Here, too, may be seen the coffin of the priestess who had a wooden arm. There are toys and toilet ornaments and many other objects, but they will all hereafter have their set place in the rooms still under arrangement. The pottery, of which there is an immense quantity, is being set out in the third room, the chronological system being as far as possible adhered to in this department also. The fourth room will contain objects of art, such as jewels, beads, necklaces, and scarabs, of which a long historical series will be exhibited. One case will contain examples of the best kind of the blue glaze, for which the Egyptian potters were so remarkable at different periods; and the visitor will see another proof of what has often been remarked already, that the potter's blue varied according to the prosperity of the period at which he lived. The work is progressing so rapidly, that in a very few months we may hope to see our entire Egyptian collection rearranged on a system intelligible and instructive; contrived, no longer to puzzle, but to guide the visitor, and to make the study of the oldest art in the world comparatively simple and easy.

THE HUMOURS OF FEDERATION MEETINGS.

"MR. PICTON'S resolution," we read in the Daily News of Tuesday, "in favour of removing the duties on tea, coffee, and cocoa was passed unanimously. Mr. Picton may be heartily congratulated on the rapidity with which he has brought this important subject within the range of practical politics. His success is so great that a Liberal Government will be bound to provide for a free breakfast-table without delay. Indeed, the only doubt is [lege it was well known before that the thing was on the cards] whether the present Ministry may not forestall Mr. Gladstone, and devote part or the whole of Mr. Goschen's surplus to this purpose. But in any case the credit will belong to Mr. Picton and the Liberal party." When we meet a brave man with a sense of humour we take our hats off to him; and we have seldom been more in this attitude of chapeau bas than towards the writer of these lines. Of course he may be only a stupid man who believes what he says; but to hold this would be to take too gloomy a view of human nature. We prefer to think him one who knows that a devotee of Mr. Gladstone will stand anything; and though we could not, or because we could not, equal his exploit, we admire him sincerely. Of such is—not exactly the Kingdom of Heaven, but—the Republic of another place. You get together a perfectly irresponsible caucus, and you propose motions to it—motions which, it may be, are in effect a score years old or thereabouts, and are acquiesced in by every party, with the proviso "when it can be done with safety to the public." You pass them; and if the whole or part of your motion takes effect at any time afterwards, "the whole credit is due" to you. So did George Borrow's bagman "demolish the Corn-laws" somewhere about 1840, and when the Corn-laws were, in fact, abolished, "the whole credit was due," teste the Daily News, to the bagman. This little matter is really interesting, because it is so excellent an example of what the value of these meetings (transported from America into surroundings quite other than American) is. Their strength lies in what we have already called their irresponsibility. If, to continue, with apologies, to quote our admirable D.N., the duty or any part of the duty is taken off tea, coffee, and cocoa, at any future time, "the whole credit will be due" to Mr. Picton and the tailors of Tooley Street. If none is taken off, it will not be Mr. Picton's or the tailors of Tooley Street's fault. Securi judicant; a new but strictly classical sense of securus. When Conservative caucuses do things of this kind, the leaders rap them on the knuckles, a tribute to political honesty which Gladstonian leaders naturally have no intention of following. If Mr. Goschen has a surplus, and does not so use it, a stick to beat Mr. Goschen is ready; if at some future time Mr. Gladstone, or that almost inconceivable Government which is to succeed Mr. Gladstone, has a surplus, and does not so use it, there will be, of course, plenty of excuses to make. In short, "I'll have the turkey, and you shall have the buzzard; or you shall have the buzzard, and I'll have the turkey; I can't say fairer nor that."

But these were by no means the only japes which refreshed the souls of a thirsty federation, very moderately slaked by Mr. Gladstone's eloquence, and not by any means quenched by the sudden "turning on" of Sir William Harcourt. As far as it is possible for outsiders to understand the feelings of Gladstonians, we should judge that they were profoundly dissatisfied with the first, and not excessively stimulated by the second. But when these oppressive high persons had gone away, and Mr. Picton and Professor Stuart and Sir Wilfrid Lawson and that Apostle of Veracity, the Rev. W. Tuckwell, were left to their own devices, things improved. Mr. Gladstone had said very little about the "social question"; nothing at all about Heptarchical Home Rule. If that curious "Radical"—too genuine-voiced to be a hoax—who wrote to the Times the other day, and said that Mr. Gladstone would never get rid of the evil influence of Eton and Oxford, had actually gone to Manchester, we fear that his anticipated disgust would have been real. But with Mr. Picton and Professor Stuart, with Sir Wilfrid Lawson and the Reverend Mr. Tuckwell, there was balm. We have even forgotten that "noble lady," Mr. Stansfeld, who decided that long Parliaments must be shortened. In his experience of long Parliaments Mr. Stansfeld, we may admit, has not been happy; the longer the Parliaments the greater the opportunity for Mr. Stansfeld to show what he is made of, and the unfortunate result is that a politician who some twenty years ago was still thought of as a politician who might "come," is now thought of only as a politician who may go—to Ireland and other places, where the old political moons go. And then there came Mr. F. A. Channing, who, in the perhaps unavoidable absence of Mr. Conybeare, loyally does duty as witness that Oxford can write herself down as well as Cambridge i' faith, even though Professor Stuart be there. Mr. F. A. Channing quoted Sydney Smith on the subject of "unalterable fools." Was not this a little, just a very little, rash? Him followed that consistent and important politician, Mr. Winterbotham, who "thought they should demand the reacquisition of the land by the State." But what the State after reacquiring was to do with it, Mr. Winterbotham said not. Nevertheless, he was sure that something must "raise the wages of the agricultural labourer, and improve his position all round." It is so easy to improve a thing all round, so facile to let the one bucket go up without the other bucket going down. And still in a crescendo came the Reverend W. Tuckwell, whom we are always glad to see on any platform. The Rev. W. Tuckwell talked (according to the Daily News, on which we throw the whole responsibility of the quotation) about the "brutal farmer." A strong effort, not for the first time, is being made to induce the farmer to believe that Gladstonians are his friends. Let him, only let him, listen to the Reverend W. Tuckwell and his adjective. Farmer is good; "brutal farmer" is good; and by their adjectives shall the farmer know his friends. It is true, of course, that the antecedents of this clerical person render his words somewhat difficult of interpretation. From a famous passage in his history it would appear that the Reverend W. Tuckwell may only have called the farmer brutal under stress of caucus, that his tongue may have said "brutal" while his mind meant "angelic." But this distinction may not commend itself to the downright agriculturist. "Brutal farmer" is worth keeping; we thank the Reverend W. Tuckwell for the word.

Unkind reporters have assigned so small a place to Professor Stuart and others that we have no opportunity of criticizing their doubtless interesting utterances. Captain Verney suggested to the agricultural labourers that there were pumps to put people under, or, in his own words, that "a catastrophe" might come if the agricultural labourer was not properly bribed. And then the caucus listened to the Marquess of Ripon. We have often wondered what are the real feelings of meetings composed in part of tolerably intelligent men when they listen to this unfortunate person. Except Sir Robert Peel, there is probably no man living who has had such opportunities as the Marquess of Ripon, and has thrown them away so utterly. Driven through absolute incompetence in each from place to place, kicked upstairs to perhaps the highest position, short of the Prime Ministership, open to an Englishman, and found through mere incapacity mischievously hopeless in that—he has come back to England to have insults to his order thrown in his face at public meetings, and to express his satisfaction with them and his readiness to bear anything in the service of Mr. Gladstone. Lord Compton, who followed him later, scarcely deserves such hard words. A well-intentioned and weak-minded heir to a peerage often plays Radical for a time, and no great harm is done; for a fruit sec like Lord Ripon there is no hope. But between those two came that other "unfortunate nobleman," Sir Wilfrid Lawson, to provide "cheers and laughter." "Oh, the dreary, dreary laughter; oh, the barren, barren cheer!" Yet Sir Wilfrid, for the first time, to our knowledge, for many years, made a really good point, and they did not laugh. "To argue seriously against a hereditary legislature would be an insult to their understanding," he said. Alas! it would. To argue seriously before an audience of persons not sensible, is the most hopeless and unforgivable insult to the foolish understanding that can be conceived.

To pass in review such speakers as these may be agreeable enough for the political partisan. We could not, for our own parts, wish any party to which we were opposed other leaders than Messrs. Picton and Stuart, Channing and Winterbotham, than the Apostle of Political Veracity, than Lord Ripon and (though we own we have some compunction in this case) Lord Compton—than, above all, Sir Wilfrid Lawson. To expect political leaders of this class to have brains might be excessive. Not many men have these at any time; and, when you have provided for the chief actors in each party, you cannot expect the comparses to have much left for their share. But such comparses as these are rare. And yet it may be admitted that there is a certain propriety about them after all. The Gladstonian party does not like the clergy; and it may be admitted that, if all the clergy were like the Reverend W. Tuckwell, the sooner the Church of England is disestablished, disendowed, merged in any sect or schism that has ever existed, the better. The Gladstonian party does not like titles, and it may be admitted that three such examples of the failure of titles to secure brains for their holders as Sir Wilfrid Lawson, as Lord Ripon, and, in another way, as Lord Compton, would be hard to find. It does not like Universities, and if the products—distinguished in a way, endowed, experienced—of University life were, even in a majority, such as Mr. Channing and Mr. Stuart, then the prayer of every rational son of Oxford and of Cambridge would be "Down with them! down with them! even to the ground." And so this curious party combines its leaders and its awful examples in one—a proceeding startling at first sight, but economical, ingenious, and no doubt effective. No man can scruple much to pray for the ending of the House of Lords when he thinks merely of Lord Ripon, of the Universities when he thinks merely of Professor Stuart, of the Church when he thinks merely of Mr. Tuckwell. Gladstonians wish to concentrate their thought on such examples, and they keep the examples in evidence accordingly. For the children of this world are in their generation—but the text is something musty.

SIDE LIGHTS OF THE FRENCH REVOLUTION.

I.

THE PRISONS OF PARIS UNDER THE REVOLUTION.

IT has been observed since the production of The Dead Heart, at the Lyceum Theatre, that the scene in the third act, the only comic one in the piece, in which the condemned, peeping through the bars of their prison doors, jest with one another, and at the expense of their gaoler, could never have happened. Strange, however, as it may appear, similar scenes were of frequent occurrence in almost every one of the prisons of Paris from 1792 to 1794. If we wish to form an idea of what a political prison in Paris was during that awful period, the Reign of Terror, we must get rid of all preconceived notions of prison life. For in this, as almost everything else, the first Republic was conspicuously original. It should be remembered that by far the greater number of the prisons had only a few years previously been monasteries—therefore, in no way fitted for their terrible transformation. Again, the number of prisoners was so great, and the changes among them so constant, that very little or no order could be observed, and the unlucky wretches once inside the grim and well guarded portals were allowed to do pretty well as they liked. Fortunately, among the thousands of victims of revolutionary tyranny, many survived, and have left us interesting memoirs and details of how they spent their time in confinement. These documents, which have been carefully preserved in the national archives of France, can be verified on reference to the drier official records still extant of the different prisons. The principal prisons were Plessis, Louis-le-Grand, both of which had only recently been famous public colleges, the Hôtel de la Force, a part of the Palace of Luxembourg, the ex-convents of the Carmelites, the Abbaye, and St. Lazare, the Châtelet, Conciergerie, the Madelonnettes, and Port Libre. Of these the most horrible was the Châtelet, situated where now stands the theatre of the same name. It had been a prison for centuries, was filthily dirty, and only a few years ago, when improvements were being made in the neighbourhood where it once stood, horrible dungeons and oubliettes were discovered. The Conciergerie, for ever famous as the prison of Marie Antoinette, was originally part of the Palace of St. Louis, King of France. With the exception of the cell in which the unfortunate Queen was confined, it was spacious and, comparatively speaking, cheerful. There were, however, some ugly dungeons under a vast Gothic hall, which was used as a revolutionary tribunal, and which in the last century was popularly known as the Hall of Héloïse and Abélard. It has unfortunately long since disappeared, and, indeed, of the old Conciergerie nothing now remains but a few walls and the two little rooms which are consecrated to the memory of Marie Antoinette. A vast courtyard divided by an iron grating served as a promenade for the prisoners, the women being on the one side, the men on the other, and in another huge Gothic hall, likewise cut in two by an iron railing, the men and women were permitted to pass the evening, and to spend the day when wet. They could thus easily communicate with each other. In order to give as concise an account as possible of prison life in 1793, we will confine ourselves almost exclusively to Port Libre—of which an interesting description is given in the Diary of Coittan, which appeared in 1815 in Le Tableau des Prisons de Paris. At Port Libre, an immense building, once a religious institution, the men and women assembled together at dinner, and spent the evening in each other's company. If a prisoner had money, especially at the Conciergerie, he was able, at least when the infamous Brassier was gaoler, to secure a private bedroom and a good many comforts and luxuries, otherwise his food was of the commonest, and very scant. Some idea may be formed of the mixed state of society in these prisons by referring to the register of Port Libre, commonly known as La Bourbe, and to Coittan. On September 17, 1793, we find among the prisoners the Baron de Witterbach, one of the greatest violinists of the eighteenth century (who, by the way, was permitted to bring his instrument with him, and frequently delighted the company by performing upon it); the Duchess d'Ayen, aged 84, and afterwards decapitated with her daughter the Vicomtesse de Noailles, the Princess de Mouchy, La Bord, a well-known member of the Montagne; Cuny, a valet of the late Marquis de Coigny (he attempted to commit suicide by cutting his throat with a sharp stone a few hours before he was taken to be guillotined), the whole of the family of the Marquis de Villiers de Montien, father, mother, a son, and two daughters; the Marquise de Bussy and her charming daughter, aged 18, who had insisted upon accompanying her mother to prison; the Marquis de Sombreuil and his son and daughter, the latter one of the great heroines of the Revolution, who, it will be remembered, threw herself before her father to save him from the assassins at the Force during the horrible massacres of September. Another prisoner, who arrived a few days later, was Laride, the well-known actor from the Théâtre Français. He came in company with a charming little boy of the name of Croisne, fifteen years of age, who had a turn for improvising poetry, but whom neither talent nor grace saved from the guillotine, and, finally, Malesherbes and his family, which included the Rosembeaus, and several ladies and gentlemen of rank. These unfortunate people fraternized with each other, and here is a description of how they passed the evening:—"We usually spent the earlier part of the evening after supper, which was very bad, in what had been the dining-room of this prison when it had been a religious institution. The ladies, elegantly but simply dressed, brought their knitting and sat at the round table, whilst the men played cards and dominoes. A little later we joined in conversation; our friend the violinist Witterbach performed some of his divine melodies, and occasionally some one recited verses usually the reverse of favourable to the Republic. We sang, we laughed, we even made love. Trifling incidents became of deep interest to us. Thus, on one occasion, a handsome young man stole a diamond-mounted watch belonging to one of the prisoners. He was caught red-handed and transferred to another prison. Three or four days afterwards we heard that he had been guillotined. Again, one night Vigée, who had written a really fine poem in honour of Mademoiselle Sombreuil, in which he described the horrors of the 2nd September and the heroic manner in which that young lady had saved her father's life, recited it for our benefit amidst thunders of applause." Politics naturally absorbed the greater part of the conversation, and, as a rule, although there were valiant Republicans among the prisoners, and equally staunch Royalists, great politeness reigned, and there was considerable wit and refinement. The dread roll-call, however, frequently interrupted these harmonious parties, and then agonizing scenes took place. The departure of the virtuous Malesherbes, for instance, and his family, for the guillotine, produced a vivid impression upon all the prisoners, who accompanied them, as far as they were permitted, to the door. Here is an entry of the 2nd January, 1794:—"A piteous incident occurred to-day. The mother of Rosembeau, who had quite lost her head with grief, was summoned to her terrible end. Lividly pale, she rose from her chair where she had been sobbing violently, and approaching Mademoiselle de Sombreuil, said to her: 'Good-bye, my child, you had the courage to defend your father's life, I shall have the courage to see my husband and children die,' and with these words she left the prison for ever." Horrible mistakes occasionally occurred. The gaoler one morning cried out that he wanted the Citizen Vigne. There happened to be two prisoners of the same name, one a lad of 15, who was playing at bowls on the green in the centre of the cloister, another an old man of 70. The boy answered innocently, on hearing his family name cried out; he was evidently not wanted, but the gaoler took him off all the same, observing as he did so "that one prisoner was as good as another." The rapid changes of administration, the rise and fall of the demagogues, sometimes in a few hours, occasioned the utmost confusion, so that there is nothing surprising to anybody who has studied attentively the Reign of Terror in the incident of Citizen Landry, the hero of The Dead Heart, passing in a few hours from the awful position of Chief of a Section to the guillotine. On the night of March 25, 1794, Lacroix gave a remarkable dinner party at which about a dozen persons were present, including Sebastian Lacroix, Dufourny, Ricord, Barras, Varlet, General Lapoype, and Momoro. On April 15 every one of them, with the exception of three, perished on the scaffold. It is not surprising, either, that a gaoler should be confused as to the identity of his prisoners, for in less than six months the gaolers at the Madelonnettes were changed five times—that is to say, four of them were sent under one pretext or another to the scaffold. At Plessis, for some reason which has not been known, all the employés of the prison were arrested in March 1794, and only four out of fourteen escaped death. In short, a man who was at the acme of power one day could not be certain if he would be alive in a week. The fall from power of Hébert, one of the most terrible personages of the time, took less than thirty hours—that is to say, he was arrested by a sudden shift of the political kaleidoscope when he held Paris as it were in the palm of his hand, dragged before the revolutionary tribunal, condemned one day and executed the next. Then, considering the laissez-aller of the innumerable prisoners, the frequent changes made amongst them, the terrible confusion that existed in every department of administration, and all over the city, it is not very remarkable that the most extraordinary blunders should occur. Many of the prisoners, too, changed their names, and as the whole administration of the city was in the hands of people the majority of whom could not read or write, such trifles as executing one man or woman for another were scarcely worth troubling about, for during the worst period of 1794, when the famine was raging, it really appeared a matter of supreme indifference who was guillotined, providing that the fell instrument was kept well supplied with victims. In a necessarily brief article it is impossible to give more than a vague idea of the condition of the prisons of Paris during the Revolution; but, since the matter has been very much discussed, it may prove of interest to state that even such an apparently improbable legend as that which M. Renan selected for his drama, L'Abbesse de Jouarre, is by no means an extravagant story; in point of fact, such instances of singular depravity occurred again and again.

A very striking fact is that scarcely a prisoner complains of having his pockets rifled, and instances of robbery were exceedingly rare. The prisoners, once arrested, do not seem to have been searched. After the Massacre of the Force, a large sum of money was found in the pockets, and recovered by the survivors, of the victims. It is not generally known that the agent of Mme. de Lamballe, the day after her death, had her clothes and money restored to him. In May, 1794, a decree was issued by the Commune demanding that the bodies of the decapitated should be carefully searched before burial. In this month the average number of victims was always over a hundred a day, and it increased until the death of Robespierre, when this appalling period of history came to an abrupt end.

THE PERILS OF THEATRICAL TOURING.

ILLNESS and, in some cases we regret to say, death have been so busy this autumn in the ranks of the touring theatrical companies that public attention is now directed, and that not before it was time, to the sanitary, or rather insanitary, conditions by which these companies are surrounded; and it is to be hoped that the public attention so aroused will not permit itself to be satisfied with anything short of a radical change in the existing state of affairs.

The actor's life, even under the most favourable conditions (in a good London theatre, that is to say, where he holds, perhaps, a position comparatively permanent), is necessarily attended by certain risks to health. His hours are late; but on that point we consider undue stress is sometimes laid, as, though late, they are, or at any rate can be made, regular. Of far greater danger are the sudden changes of temperature and the exposure to draughts to which an actor is liable. It is inseparable from the exercise of his calling that he should expose himself to the night air as soon as he leaves his work; heated in body, and perhaps excited in mind, he quits the close and heated atmosphere of the theatre, to await at some windy street-corner or railway-station his suburban omnibus or train. He must wear as much or as little clothing as his part and the aesthetic dictates of his manager require, and so clothed or the reverse must encounter the draughts which theatrical architects have not yet learned to exclude from the stage and its coulisses. These are the necessary evils of the actor's calling, a part and parcel of his daily business; but there are other dangers which it is very clear he now incurs (in town as well as in the country—though the plight of the country actor is undeniably the worse) from which he may justly claim to be protected, and from which the public, whose servant he is, and for whose benefit he at present incurs these risks, should insist on his protection. These dangers arise from the utterly insanitary state of many theatres both in town and country, aggravated and intensified, in the case of the touring actor, by the perils of journeys and the perils of lodgings. That this last class of risk is more to be dreaded than that arising from changes of temperature is shown by the fact that the recent sad fatalities among actors have been due more often to typhoid than to bronchitis or kindred ailments.

It may be conceded that in a theatre the last place to which architectural reform makes its way is that mysterious region known as "behind the scenes." At last in the very newest of our London houses the actors are being permitted to share in some degree the comforts of their audiences; but there are many houses in which every resource of the modern decorator's art is lavished on the front of the house, while the appliances of the dressing-rooms would be rejected with scorn from the bedrooms of domestic servants. Cracked crockery, a ragged carpet (or in many cases bare boards, none too clean), broken windows mended with brown paper, windows without blinds, or with blinds that will not work, whitewashed walls whose whitewash comes off on the clothes hung against it, and whereon is inscribed in various coloured "grease-paints" the wit of previous occupants—such are the artistic and lively surroundings which the actor encounters in only too many dressing-rooms; it needs not to have travelled much to have met them all and many more of like nature. These, however, are but inconveniences; the charge against our theatres is one far more serious than of mere lack of comfort, and is no less than that many of them, especially in the country, are in a state injurious to health and actually dangerous to life.

It is undoubtedly difficult, with the limited amount of ground-space usually at the command of theatrical architects, to find any place for the dressing-rooms on the level of the stage itself, where what extra accommodation there may be is usually reserved for the storage of scenery and properties, and perhaps for a "green room," though that luxury is now by no means universal. To reach his dressing-room the actor must expect either to mount to the level of the "flies"—the galleries above the height of the loftiest scenery, from which the stage-carpenters do much of their work—or descend to the cellars. Dressing-rooms are accordingly to be found in all sorts of strange holes and corners; they are reached almost invariably by wooden staircases, often of great age; while all staircases in the front of the house are of stone or other incombustible material. Moreover, being so eccentrically placed as to convey the idea that in many cases they are but an afterthought of the contriver of the building, dressing-rooms are, as often as not, entirely without windows or any means of ventilation to the outer air; in fact, they are but cupboards, and sometimes underground cupboards, to which no lover of animals would dream of consigning a valuable horse or dog. If the dressing-room has a window, it is frequently no unmixed advantage to its occupants when the outlook is to some unsavoury court or to a mere well of brickwork in the heart of a closely-massed block of buildings. But the greatest of all dangers to health "behind the scenes" consists undoubtedly in the unsatisfactory state of the drainage and of the water-supply, and in the inefficient manner in which the operation of cleaning—the charwoman's department, in fact—is too often performed.

Let any one with a sensitive nose venture behind the scenes of some of our London and many of our provincial theatres, and to such a one the recent disasters to our travelling companies will cease to be matter for wonder. Sewer-gas asserts itself; the water-supply comes through ill-kept taps from ill-cleaned cisterns; while the walls and floors (especially in the case of underground dressing-rooms) are frequently so damp as to render the actor's clothes an additional source of danger. The sort of "dual control" which the system of touring has established in our country theatres helps to keep alive the present uncomfortable and insanitary state of things. The resident provincial manager has no special interest in the actors who week after week use his dressing-rooms; save when he produces his pantomime at Christmas-time, the performers in his theatre owe allegiance, not to him, but to another impresario, and would resent any interference on his part in their business. He therefore regards them as a means of ensuring his weekly receipts, and would grudge any outlay which would not be repaid to him by the public during their stay. The travelling manager would probably, if he noticed any shortcoming in the sanitary arrangements of the theatre, pass it over, and hope for better luck in the next town of his tour, and would assuredly consider it an act of "cutting off his nose to spite his face" if (as has been suggested) he were to boycott for its insanitary condition a theatre which in all other respects it paid him well to visit; while, as regards the actors themselves, the supply in the histrionic market is so far in excess of the demand, that a protest which might involve the loss of a good engagement is not to be lightly made, while no one with any knowledge of the theatrical calling would expect any combined action on the part of the performers, who have never manifested that knack of "hanging together" for mutual assistance which the managers with their smaller numbers and more ready means of communication possess.

The real remedy seems to lie in the hands of the licensing authorities in town and country. Let those in whose power it is to say whether a theatre shall, or shall not, be allowed to open its doors to the public extend those researches with which they have so freely and justly benefited the audience to the actor, let them be convinced by the same minute personal inspection which assures, as far as possible, the safety of the gallery boy from fire, that an actor on entering his dressing-room is not placing himself in deadly peril from casualty or from disease. We mentioned above that the actor on tour incurs other dangers from which his more stationary fellow in town is free, the dangers of travel and of strange lodgings. As regards the former, his risks exceed those of an ordinary traveller, as regards the amount of his journeys, and the conditions under which they are performed. In all railway travelling there is risk, and, ceteris paribus, the man who travels ten miles incurs double the risk of the man who travels five; and, as the average weekly journey of a theatrical company is estimated by competent authorities at ninety miles, or thereabouts, actors so employed are not as safe as they would be in the Strand. But the disadvantage of the provincial performer does not quite end there; for, as his journeys are, as a rule, undertaken on Sundays, and not unfrequently at night, he is deprived of the rest which the Londoner can enjoy on that day, and is subject to all the inconveniences of Sunday travelling, crawling trains, long waits at uncomfortable junctions, and the like.

The dangers of travel, however, are as nothing compared to those encountered in provincial lodgings. There are, of course, experienced actors who have been years "on the road" to whom are known in almost every town in the kingdom what their landladies love to see described in their visitors' book of reference as "homes from home"; but hundreds of provincial actors go week after week into towns of which they know nothing and chance haphazard, or with some very casual recommendation, on the first rooms that present themselves. Too tired of travel, it may be, to make a lengthy search, too inexperienced to observe for themselves or ask the necessary questions, they fall victims to an untrapped drain or to damp sheets, and swell the melancholy list of those who owe the loss of health, it may be of life itself, to the present system of theatrical touring.

LIFE INSURANCE.

AT the opening meeting of the current session of the Institute of Actuaries last week the President, Mr. Sutton, delivered an address upon the business of life insurance as at present conducted which is well deserving the attention of intending insurers. The first point on which he commented was the necessity for an amendment of the Act of 1870. The Act has undoubtedly proved beneficial; but it was tentative, and very soon experienced persons began to feel that it was in many respects defective. The feeling has grown stronger as years have passed by; but yet no fresh legislation has taken place. Mr. Sutton especially points out that there is need for fuller information being given by the Companies. In the accounts referred to the Board of Trade annually, for example, no separation is made of business with or without profit; none, again, of commissions and expenses between new and old business; none, either, as to the number of policies issued or becoming claims, or lapsing or surrendered; and none, finally, as to the sums assured and the premium payable. These, as the President of the Institute justly remarks, are all matters as to which particulars could easily be furnished; and we may add that they are matters, also, which ought to be known by intending insurers. How else can they form a correct judgment as to the real position of the different offices? But the defective information does not stop here. The returns under the Act do not at present enable us to ascertain what policies are taken credit for as assets in any particular account, and it is, therefore, impossible to apply this test of solvency. The Act of 1870, it will be borne in mind, gives power to the Board of Trade, upon the application of a Company or with its consent, to alter the forms contained in the schedules to the Act; but no alteration has, in fact, been made. Mr. Sutton urges upon the best-managed offices that they should now move in the matter; that they should, that is to say, give fuller information, such as would carry into effect the intention of the Act of 1870; and, if they do not, he warns them that a cry will arise for more stringent legislation than even the best-managed offices will like. It is to be hoped that the advice of the President of the Institute of Actuaries will be followed. If not, it will become the duty of Parliament to amend the Act, and so obtain the information to which the public has a right.

But the main part of Mr. Sutton's address was devoted to a subject to which we have called attention more than once in these columns—namely, the rapid increase in the expenses as compared with the premium income. Using tables annually published by the Statist, we were able to carry back our comparison over ten years. Mr. Sutton goes to a still earlier date—namely, 1872—but while we compared the whole of the Companies making returns to the Board of Trade, and classified them in four orders, he deals only with thirty-three offices, and he treats them altogether. The result, however, goes to confirm what we have observed in this journal—namely, that the expenses are growing at a dangerously rapid rate. In 1872 the thirty-three Companies dealt with by Mr. Sutton had an aggregate premium income of 5,116,109*l.* Last year the aggregate premium income had risen to 7,078,111*l.* The premiums, therefore, had increased a little under two millions, or somewhat over 38 per cent. On the other hand, the total expenses of the thirty-three Companies in 1872 amounted to 579,532*l.* Last year they had risen to 978,944*l.* The expenses, it will be seen, increased nearly 400,000*l.*, or about 63½ per cent. It will be seen that the growth of expenses has been nearly twice as rapid as the growth of income. Carrying his analysis a little further, Mr. Sutton points out that the commissions paid by the offices to agents of all kinds for bringing fresh business amounted in 1872 to 3·88 per cent. of the whole premium income, and last year they were 4·35 per cent. of the premium income. On the other hand, the expenses of management rose from 7·89 to 9·48 per cent. The expenses of management, then, or what may be called the office expenses, have grown more rapidly than the commissions, and the President of the Institute of Actuaries attributes this to the fact that the Companies have been opening branch offices instead of, as formerly, conducting their business from the head offices, the branch offices being necessarily managed almost as expensively as the head office. Evidently he would advise the suppression of the branch offices and reversion to the old practice. It is urged by the Companies that the public do not recognize the value of life insurance, that they will not themselves insure unless solicited, and that if the business were to be, as of old, conducted from the head offices, the Companies would die out. There is undoubted force in this objection. We all know what little progress has been made in Government insurance. No doubt the Government insures only for a small amount, and the classes it proposes to do business with are the poor. But still there can be no question, we think, that the main cause of the little progress made by Government insurances is, that canvassers are not employed. The fact that all offices, or nearly all, now employ agents and canvassers, is strong presumptive proof that the business was not increasing very largely, and that the management, therefore, felt the need of adopting a more energetic policy. But it may reasonably be asked, if this is so, would it not be better for a Company to allow its business to gradually decrease rather than to extend it at a ruinous cost? A really well-managed small Company may be quite as safe as a very large Company—nay, it may be far safer. It would be easy to point to some old offices whose business has been declining, and yet which are as solvent as any existing, and it is clearly better for the policy-holders in those offices that the business should decrease, and their own policies should remain perfectly safe, rather than that new business should be sought out at a cost that would risk the safety of existing policies. It will be difficult to induce directors and managers to recognize this fact. Unfortunately the public inclines to the belief that an office which does a very large business, and has immense funds, is more solvent than a stationary or declining office; failing to recognize that an immense business may be built up at too great a cost. The fact being so, it is natural that directors and managers should feel it incumbent on them to exert themselves for the purpose of attracting new business. But, while we are inclined to agree with Mr. Sutton that the new practice of extending branch offices is dangerous, and ought to be checked, we think that he makes too little of another cause of the increase of expenses—namely, the growth of commissions. True, the commissions do not appear to have grown as rapidly since 1872 as the office expenses; but the commissions for all that are very large, and are growing. An agent, pushing, energetic, and insinuating, in a position which brings him into communication with large numbers of the insuring class, may very powerfully influence these, and thus bring a great amount of business to an office. Such an agent is highly valued, and is able to insist upon large commissions being paid to him. It will be said, of course, that this is necessary, or the business would not be obtained. To which we reply with the question, Whom is it necessary to—the existing policy-holders, or the mere management?

One other important point is raised by Mr. Sutton—whether, that is to say, the medical examination to which all applicants are now subjected is not made to look more formidable than it need do. The value of medical examination is much controverted. Apparently the President of the Institute of Actuaries does not rate it very high. He seems to think that doctors do not confine themselves strictly to their proper functions, that they often speak with a dogmatism not warranted by the present state of medical knowledge, and that they consequently discourage insurance. “The fact of medical examination alone,” he says, “probably deters thousands upon thousands of persons, of quite as good health really as those who propose, from proposing at all.” And, further, insurance is made more expensive to the policy-holders and to the Companies by making reports which lead either to rejection of the proposal or to a great addition to the premium charged. He suggests, therefore, a trial of the “experiment in ordinary life insurance business of constituting a without-profit branch at such higher premiums as may be considered necessary where the sum assured per individual should be limited to a moderate amount, the insurance to be a deferred insurance instead of immediate, and the medical examination taking a much less important and formidable shape than it does on paper, at all events at the present time, in consideration of the insurance not taking effect immediately.” It has been objected that a deferred insurance is practically no assurance at all, and that there are instances in which it is not worth while to insure at all unless it can be done at once. But Mr. Sutton very carefully guards himself in the passage we have quoted above from being supposed to recommend the total abolition of medical examination. What he does suggest is an experiment added on to the present modes of doing business. No sensible body of directors would at once do away with the protection which medical examination affords; but in life assurance, as in everything else, progress can be safely effected only by cautious experiment. If it be true that thousands upon thousands are deterred from proposing by the fact that they will have to submit to a medical examination, surely it is worth while finding out whether those thousands upon thousands would be willing to accept a deferred policy and to pay a higher premium than ordinary, on condition that the medical examination should be either dispensed with altogether or made less stringent than it is now. If the experiment did not attract business, no harm would be done; if it did, and proved to be safe, it might be extended; and, if it could be extended, it would help, as Mr. Sutton points out, to bring intending assurers into immediate communication with the head office. He very justly remarks that many improvements have of late been introduced to make insurance more popular than it used to be; but he feels, all the same, that enough has not yet been done. Obstacles are interposed which he regards as unnecessary, and one of these, in his opinion, is the present character of the medical examination.

THE ROYAL SOCIETY OF BRITISH ARTISTS.

THE only unusual feature in the large collection of nearly seven hundred paintings on view this winter at the Gallery in Suffolk Street is the presence of a few miniatures, none of them very good, and of some pastel drawings, among which two, at least—those by Mr. Schäfer and Miss Dora Noyes—are strong enough to hold their own amongst their painted neighbours. It is needless to say that scenery predominates at Suffolk Street; the impression likely to be made on a foreigner by such a display of landscapes as this—after, of course, his never-failing remark upon the hopelessly gay colouring of the British school generally—would surely be one of admiration at the great variety of English scenery, with its extensive range of shades of tone, colour, and atmospheric effect that this island of ours presents. Our British river-scenery, in particular, must seem many-sided, with its shades of green running the gamut from pale lemon and keen citron down to olive and bay; although here at Suffolk Street these varieties of hue may in many cases be felt to be a little too strongly insisted upon. Among the landscapes, perhaps the most striking one is that of Mr. Frank Brangwyn (550), “Spinning Yarn,” which has considerable harmony. It represents, as its name presupposes, a rope-walk, an outdoors one, consisting of a long sandy path, with wooden posts running all along one side and part of the other, with cross-beams here and there, over which the yarn extends. Two men step slowly and softly forwards, twisting the yarn between their fingers as they advance. It is all so quiet, with the unobtrusively blue sky, the calm pale foliage and herbage, and the cool transparent shadows, that it is a really reposeful canvas to rest the eye upon, especially after gazing at the numerous paintings around it, of hot brick reds and glaucous greens. The question of shade and obscurity is still one, apparently, but little understood by our English painters, who seem often to be frightened at their own shadows. Two paintings at Suffolk Street exemplify this—"The King and his Master" (339), by Mr. Laslett Pott, where the brightly coloured and lighted figures are shadowless; and a canvas of Mr. W. H. Pike's, where confusion reigns more than is usual amongst crowds, and where, despite the amount of detail and character-drawing that he has given to each member of the group, for want of an atmospheric quantity the figures cling together like the spawn of a frog. There are many pretty "bits" of landscape here. In "The Pond on the Common" (414), by Mr. J. H. Snell, the branch network of the trees is softly rendered, and the feeling of chilliness in the late afternoon air is well suggested. No. 426, "Meadow Sweet," by Mr. F. W. Jackson, is pretty; but why should it not have a fairer sky, instead of this heavy grey one, so surcharged with the hard East wind? A river-scene (471), by Mr. Horace H. Canty, is very correct and complete. Mr. Anderson Hague's pasty green trees in 347 are not so pleasant to contemplate; while the pretty country homestead (356), by Mr. Follen Bishop, is spoilt by the two frivolous town girls lounging on the garden wall. In 395, "Cowslip Gatherers," by Mr. W. B. Fortescue, if the bodices of the young women appear so gleamingly white, should not the cowslips be less dim in colour? "Amongst the Ling" (55), by Miss Ida R. Taylor, is disfigured by a crudely red and blue Japanese sunshade, which totally ruins the colour of the heather. In "A Sunny Morning" (591), by M. N. Van der Waay, an interesting experiment has been made; a cornfield of pure yellow, unvaried by any accidental touch of other colour, stretches from right to left, and in front of it is a figure in a poppy-red jacket; but we admit a preference for having our poppies mingled more diffusely amongst our corn. There is another point we cannot commend in our latest landscape-painters, their passion for so often disfiguring their landscapes by introducing into them unnecessary figures. If they suppose that it gives more importance to them they are mistaken, for it only tends to distract the attention. For instance, in 336, "A Mare Grazing," by Mr. H. M. Livens, we have a burnt grass-covered hillside, a tawny field, vanishing into a dreamy distance. Surely the beauty of this scene requires no figure. Another and more striking instance is in "A Flower Garden, Little Shelford, Cambs" (464), by Mr. V. P. Yglesias. The foreground is rendered important by large flowers, all in a row as in the classical Mary's garden, but between their stalks are seen some tiresome and quite superfluous figures in mid-distance, which detract from the effect of the flowers.

There are many excellent and charming sea-scapes here, among which "The Home of the Sea Fowl" (335), by Mr. Horace Canty, is one of the best. It shows the gem-like Devonshire coast, with its cliffs clad with golden lichens, and fringed with the pink thrift, the amethyst blue of the sea gleaming beyond; truly a most refreshing outlook to dwellers in London. Compared with this, "Sunny Cornwall" (490), by Mr. W. H. Y. Titcombe, looks rough, which it literally is, as if it needed some scraping down. "Grandfather" (619), a strip of sea-beach, by Miss Flora M. Reid, is charming; it looks so delightfully wet! But in "Trawlers at Anchor" (215), by Mr. W. Ayerst Ingram, a pleasant enough plain little picture, the front sea gives the impression of standing upright, on edge as it were—these flat surfaces being difficult to render without the aid of a little parallel drawing. We must mention but one more picture of the sea, and that shall be "Homewards" (429), by Mr. F. Cayley Robinson; this is a most original and fascinating painting. It represents, on a large canvas, a stretch of queer tan-coloured wet sands, with the meandering tidal rivulets coursing their way back to the distant sea, which is seen as a smack-besailed line on the horizon. Strange Druid-like erections, of black and white piles, stand up high against the sky. Two fisher-girls cross the sands, returning with their baskets; but the blue clothes of the one and the copper-red hair of the other seem a little too bright for the general low tone of this otherwise satisfactory composition.

Of figure-pieces, No. 588, by Mr. W. H. Pike, is certainly a very clever piece of characterization; it suggests well one of Dickens's seedy, smart, and needy personages. "Cupid and Psyche" (605), by Mr. F. H. A. Parker, is, with its dim light and its dreamy figures, rather charming. Mr. Van der Waay's "Meditation" (617) is large and ugly; but the white-aproned knees of the figure are well painted. "Going to Mass" (88), by Mr. F. Colman, is an excellent study of a boy in a religious procession; it is good in colour and solidly handled. Mr. Walter Langley has a most completely attuned study here—"Interesting News" (210)—of an old man reading a paper. This is solid good work; the several tones of white are well rendered; but might not the white of the newspaper itself have been more boldly given?

We are unable to decide which pictures seem to us to be the worst. No. 80 is carefully bad; 400 is theatrically worse; but we think, on the whole, perhaps 601, with its lay-figure lady sprawling on the ground, is the worst of all. Nor should the painting of Mr. Wyke Bayliss, the President, be overlooked by the curious observer, particularly the most strange elation of the saints (542). We should like to understand better the anatomy of the two young ladies in "Dolce far Niente" and in "An Old World Melody." In the one a young lady, clad in bright blue, with sample-bright shades of yellow, carmine, pink, and green around her, is nursing her knee, which has apparently no downward continuation to it at all. And, in the other painting, a little note to explain whether the reclining figure on the couch has its front or its back to the spectator would prevent unnecessary distraction; we ourselves incline to think that at first it was intended for back, but that the picture seemed to compose better by turning it round. We have often heard it said that many of the Great Masters have been unable to "find their subject" until they have turned it entirely round. Perhaps this may throw some light on that obscure practice of theirs.

MONEY MATTERS.

THE Chancellor of the Exchequer paid this week to the County Councils nearly two millions as a contribution in aid of local taxation. The money has been lent out, and has so depressed the rate of interest in the short loan market, that in many cases bankers have been unable to lend at all. The rate of discount also fell so much that it has become profitable to export gold to many countries which hitherto could not take it without a loss. During the week ended Wednesday night there was withdrawn from the Bank of England about 370,000*l.* It is expected that about 400,000*l.* will be taken for Spain, Germany also wants the metal, and now preparations are being made to send it to New York. The probability, therefore, is that the excessive ease this week will be followed by a scare next week, and that rates will rise as unduly as they have fallen. The Bank of Spain is permitted by law to issue notes to the extent of four times its metallic reserve. As it has been lending lavishly to the Government, it practically reached the limit some time ago. Therefore it became necessary to obtain gold, and it is understood that arrangements have been made for a million sterling. That, however, exhausts the credit of the Government, but it enables the Bank of Spain to increase very considerably its advances.

The Report of the Secretary of the United States Treasury has caused a fall in silver and in rupee paper, for his plan of issuing notes secured by the deposit of silver is regarded as utterly impracticable. Shortly stated, the plan is this—to issue Treasury Notes against the deposit of silver bullion at the market price of the silver when deposited, and payable on demand in such quantities of silver bullion as will equal in value at the date of presentation the number of dollars expressed on the face of the notes at the market price of silver, or in gold, at the option of the Government, or in silver dollars, at the option of the holder; at the same time, to repeal the Act making the coinage of silver compulsory. It is objected that, as nobody under the plan could foresee what amount of silver bullion he would get on presenting his notes for redemption, nobody would deposit the metal; and, further, it is objected that, if the plan were accepted and could be made to work, it would make the Secretary of the Treasury master of the silver industry. He could raise or lower prices as he liked, and stop or increase the issue of notes at his pleasure. The first objection does not appear a very strong one; but the second is exceedingly serious. It is hardly credible that the American people will entrust a Minister with such power. The failure of the plan ought not, however, so much to discourage the silver market; for it is certain that the silver party in the United States will introduce a Bill to increase the coinage, and there is every reason to believe that they will be able to carry it through both Houses of Congress. Of course the President has the right to veto the Bill when passed; and nobody can say now whether he will exercise that right or not. It does not seem likely that he will if the Secretary's plan is rejected; for the Secretary himself admits that some measure must be carried for keeping silver as well as gold as money.

Apart from Mr. Windom's plan, the causes affecting the silver market are in favour of better prices. The refusal of the India Council to sell on Wednesday at the prices tendered seems to indicate that the Council expects an improvement in silver, and, in fact, the Council has sold so many bills and telegraphic transfers already that it can maintain an independent attitude. Besides, the exports from India are very large, and consequently the Indian demand for silver is likely to be on a considerable scale for some months to come. The Mint, too, continues buying, and there are other demands to satisfy.

The stock markets have been weak and dull all through the week. The monthly Liquidation has been going on on the Paris Bourse, and the Berlin Bourse has not recovered from the difficulties of the Liquidation completed last week. Besides the prospect of renewed strikes in the coal trade has sent down the prices of mining shares, and threatens to increase the apprehended difficulties at the Liquidation at the close of this month. Then, again, the New York Stock Exchange has suffered from the fall in Trust shares which followed the decision of the Chicago Court referred to last week. Further, the effects of the Brazilian Revolution continue to make themselves felt; while the crisis in the Argentine Republic is likely to become more acute every day.

Over and above all this, the approach of the Christmas holidays and the end of the year, with the prospect of a dearer money market next week, discourage fresh business. And, lastly, there is danger of a serious strike in the South Wales coal trade, and the labour disputes all over the country are not encouraging to business.

Ever since the outbreak of the Brazilian revolution there have been rumours of an impending revolution in Spain. Possibly these rumours have been circulated by speculators, for no doubt there is a large speculative account open for the fall upon the Continental Bourses. But, on the other hand, the condition of Spain is very unsatisfactory, with financial difficulties affecting the Government, with the Cortes given over to party spirit, and with widespread discontent in the country. Spanish bonds have fallen during the week, and are expected to fall still further. As they are held very largely by Paris banks, the fall has given rise to various rumours respecting those banks, which are probably greatly exaggerated.

The nitrate Companies have agreed to stop working for a month, not to sell under 9*l.* a ton, and to take measures for pushing sales at home upon the Continent and in America. There has, therefore, been some renewal of interest in nitrate securities. For the time being they have rather gone out of fashion, other and newer securities having caught the public fancy. But the parties interested are powerful, and their exertions may not improbably revive general interest in them once more.

Since the breakdown of the copper speculation in Paris the consumption of the metal has so increased that the deliveries during the seven months from the 1st of May to the end of November exceeded by fully one-third those for the whole year 1888, and were rather larger than those for the whole year 1886, when the price of copper was exceedingly low, only about 40*l.* a ton, additional evidence of the extraordinary activity of trade all over the world. To some extent, no doubt, the military preparations of all the great Governments of the world increased the consumption; but the increase in this way cannot have been very material. It is chiefly the demand for shipbuilding, telegraph, and telephone construction, and other trade purposes, which has produced so unexpected a result. The price of copper has been this week over 50*l.* a ton. At the time of the crisis in Paris it fell to about 35*l.* a ton, and if the consumption continues, there may be even a further advance, though doubtless production will now be stimulated by the recovery in the market. Copper-mining shares have all advanced along with the price of copper. All this unquestionably has relieved the Paris Bourse and the Paris bankers very greatly. The bankers who came to the assistance of the Comptoir d'Escompte have been able, it is said, already to get rid of a part of the copper which they took over, and no doubt will now be able to sell the rest on even better terms.

We are threatened with a serious strike in the South Wales coal trade. For some time there have been negotiations between the workmen and their employers. The workmen proposed that wages should be regulated by a sliding scale based upon the average selling price of coal. But the employers rejected the proposal. The men also proposed a maximum and minimum in the scale, which was likewise rejected. A further proposal was that all questions relating to the sliding scale should be referred to a joint committee for settlement, and this also was rejected; as was likewise another proposal that the hours of labour in future should be—for surface men nine hours a day, and for underground men eight hours. It is to be hoped that matters will not be allowed to go to extremes, as a strike of the kind would disorganize every industry in the country.

LA TOSCA.

IF La Tosca does not show M. Sardou at his best, as we hold to be the case, it contains work that is worthy of his reputation. He has true dramatic instinct and an ingenuity which serves him alike in such a piece of extravagant humour as Divorçons, in the genuine comedy of Les Pattes de Mouche, and in the tragedy of the play now being represented at the Garrick Theatre. The composition is so well known that we hesitate to dwell on its familiar points. In Messrs. Grove and Hamilton's English version it will be perceived, from the employment of the word husband, that Floria Tosca is the wife of Cavaradossi, and there seems no very particular reason why it should not be represented that their union has the sanction of the Church. If the suggestion of domesticity thus imported into the play to some extent interferes with the flavour of romance, the lovers' interview in the chapel of St. Andrea is thus made less scandalous; though, on the other hand, it does not indeed quite appear why husband and wife should make appointments to meet away from home; but such matters scarcely strike one during the progress of a play, though in the first two acts of La Tosca the movement of the story is so slow that there is much time for critical analysis if one be tempted to examine too curiously.

Mrs. Bernard Beere has previously given proof of her ability to follow successfully where Mme. Sarah Bernhardt has led the way, a task the difficulty of which may be easily underrated. The two are in many ways strangely unlike in their methods. There is little in Mrs. Beere's performance of the essentially feminine charm which pervades all that is done by the great French actress. The finesse which is so delightful in Mme.

Bernhardt's studies is absent from those of Mrs. Beere, who wins her way by sheer dramatic force wonderfully well sustained. It is, indeed, extraordinary that the very tempest, torrent, and whirlwind of passion should be, as it is here, unflaggingly kept up through more than half the play; for if the English Tosca is not always actually at fever heat, the fire never ceases perceptibly to smoulder just beneath the surface, as in the interview with Scarpia, in the fourth act—a scene which it may be remembered precisely reproduces the incidents of a play which the American actor, Mr. Maurice Barrymore, wrote and produced a few years ago at the Haymarket. Mrs. Beere's success is never in doubt from first to last as soon as the real test begins. When once she has realized the mental agonies of the Tosca, as Scarpia, stern and inflexible, bends over her, and tells her that the horrid work in the next room will continue or be suspended according as she speaks or is silent, the actress reaches a height from which it is felt that there is little likelihood of her falling. M. Berton struck us as unnecessarily violent as Scarpia in this scene. It may have been, as we suggested when writing about the play at the time, a desire to emphasize the fact that hot Southern blood ran in the Roman's veins; but he did not convey the idea of a really powerful man, for control of the outward exhibition of fury—or any prevailing passion, whatever it may be—is surely the truest indication of mental strength. Mr. Forbes-Robertson, the Garrick Scarpia, is judicious without being deficient in force, and Mr. Hare's good taste has induced him to tone down those pronounced signs of the torture, the shriek of agony, the blood-stained forehead, and so forth, which when the French work was played seemed to us beyond the legitimate limits of dramatic art. The episode is in every way more discreetly treated. The subdued and altered tone of Cavaradossi's voice as it issues from the inner chamber is just what it should be. Mr. Waller's utterances here could not be better, for they make perfectly plain what has been done, and yet are not painfully shocking, as the cry of the tortured man was at the Porte-St.-Martin, and when the play was given in London by the French company with Mme. Bernhardt at its head.

In the scene of Scarpia's murder Mrs. Beere was perhaps anxious not to overdo an obvious point, and so made a little less than she might have done of the Tosca's glance at the knife on the supper-table, a glance which becomes a gaze of fixed intent as the thought passes through her mind that the sharp blade may enable her to escape the sacrifice the tyrant Scarpia has demanded as the price of her husband's life. Mrs. Beere's face does not here reveal her thoughts as vividly as they were revealed in the features of Mme. Bernhardt; and in another instance we think that the original Tosca was transcendent—the tone in which she spoke when left alone with her husband's body on the ramparts of St. Angelo after what she supposes to have been a sham execution. We are inclined to hold that nothing finer has been seen on the stage—and we will not put any limit of time to this remark—than Mme. Bernhardt's performance at this point. It is beyond all else clear that no shadow of doubt as to Mario having passed safely through the ordeal rests on her mind. There is supreme joy in her first half-cautious utterance of his name, and we feel distinctly, as she repeats it, how the germ of the doubt arises and grows till the horrible discovery is made that the beloved one, of whose safety she has been convinced, with whom she has anticipated bliss made the greater by remembrance of the terrors through which they have passed, lies dead at her feet. Mrs. Beere is very good, but not superlatively so. She faithfully expresses what she has to convey; but we do not hang breathlessly on her words and watch with the rapt attention which was the tribute paid to the genius of Mme. Bernhardt. We think, too, that in earlier scenes some little repression might well be occasionally introduced by Mrs. Beere. The passion is maintained at too high a pitch. Thus when, pleading to Scarpia, she asks, "Am I not humble enough?" a quieter tone—more of humility, in fact—would be better. There is in Mrs. Beere's Tosca, however, so much which deserves almost the highest praise, and so much more which merits cordial approbation, that it is necessary to judge her by the standard of little short of flawless excellence in order to find very much fault. She powerfully impresses her audience, and—unless the genius of Miss Ellen Terry were brought to bear upon a character of a sort for which she has never shown any preference—it would be difficult to name an English actress other than Mrs. Beere who would be tolerable after Mme. Bernhardt.

We have commended Mr. Forbes-Robertson for his well-considered representation of Scarpia, and Mr. Lewis Waller for his treatment of Cavaradossi; but, in fact, the performance is good in all respects. Mr. Herbert Waring's earnestness as the hunted fugitive Angelotti must by no means be overlooked. His interview with Cavaradossi was so very naturally done that we followed it with particular interest, forgetting for a time the slow development of the story. Mr. Gilbert Farquhar, again, gives character to the sketch of the Marchese Attavanti, a complaisant husband with just a little show of regard for appearances. The Marchesa has a cavaliere servente; and the most amusing thing in the play is Attavanti's reproach to him for ignorance of the lady's proceedings. "I am much hurt at your want of influence over my wife," is the complaint. The part of Maria Carolina, the Queen of Naples, is filled with all due dignity by Miss Rose Leclercq. The complete manner in which Mr. Hare has prepared La Tosca will be understood when it is remembered for how few minutes an actress of Miss Leclercq's position appears on the stage. Mr. Sydney Brough, again, only occupies the boards for a very short time as Trevillac. Schiarrone dwells in the memory, though his voice is scarcely heard half a dozen times. He is an agent of police, one of Scarpia's following, and to him it falls to stand at the door of the torture-chamber and convey his master's orders to the executioner. The stern, upright figure, with the cold, hard-set face, is very striking. Mr. Charles Hudson is the representative of the part. Miss Bessie Hatton, who distinguished herself as the Prince in the recent revival of Richard III. at the Globe, plays with delightful brightness and ease as Gennarino, Cavaradossi's attendant. If the promise be fulfilled, we have in this very young lady an actress who cannot fail to rise to enviable heights in her profession. For Mr. Hare there is no character, but we feel that he has greatly aided the success by the discrimination with which he has chosen his assistants in various departments, as well as by the smoothness and excellence of the general representation in the arrangement and conduct of the work. Mr. Hare's well-recognized ability as a stage manager has never been better exhibited. The language of the adaptation has a literary distinction exceptional in English versions of French plays, but the name of Mr. F. C. Grove as the first writer might well have been accepted as a guarantee that this would be so. The scenery is notable even in these days of picturesque and artistic stage-setting. Mr. E. Salomons' design for the Church of St. Andrea is wholly admirable in proportion, detail, and colour, and, besides the solidity of the structure of the Villa Cavaradossi and the ramparts of the castle of St. Angelo, the views of distant Roman landscape are delightful. We remember nothing so good since the paintings which formed backgrounds to the revival of Romeo and Juliet at the Lyceum in 1881. Sketches of the costumes from the graceful pencil of Mr. E. A. Abbey have also been obtained, and these of course form a special attraction. The entire representation may be pointed to with pride and gratification as a worthy example of contemporary dramatic art.

RECENT CONCERTS.

THE unaccountable apathy with which the musical public just at present regards orchestral performances caused St. James's Hall to be very poorly attended on the 22nd ult., when Sir Charles Hallé gave the first of the four orchestral concerts which he has announced for the present season. It is some years since the Manchester orchestra has been heard in London; but it may be safely said that for a long time no finer performances have taken place than those which rewarded the too scanty audience which assembled on the 22nd. The programme was arranged so as to display the quality of the band to the utmost advantage. Accustomed to play continually together under so sympathetic a conductor as Sir Charles Hallé, the individual members of the orchestra seem to have caught no small measure of his enthusiasm, and the result is that their playing is characterized by an extraordinary amount of spirit and vigour. The wonderful brilliancy and precision of the strings was particularly remarkable in Cherubini's Overture to Anacreon, in which the difficult passages assigned to the first violins were rendered with an accuracy and finish which it would be difficult to surpass. Though the whole orchestra is entitled to the greatest praise, a large share of the credit for such admirable performances is due to the leader, Mr. Willy Hess, who has more than once been heard in London as a soloist. The first part of the programme comprised, in addition to the Cherubini Overture, two of Dvořák's Légendes, which were played with great delicacy, the minutest gradations of tone being fully, but not unduly, emphasized. The first part concluded with Beethoven's Violin Concerto, the solo part in which was performed in her best style by Mme. Neruda. The second part of the concert consisted of Berlioz's extraordinary Symphonie Fantastique, Episode de la vie d'un Artiste, a work which has been very seldom heard in London. Here, again, the orchestra did the fullest justice to the dramatic character of the composition, the occasional extravagances of the music being admirably toned down by the faultless interpretation it received.

The last two Saturday Concerts at the Crystal Palace, though principally devoted to the repetition of familiar works, have been by no means devoid of interest. The most noticeable feature of the programme on the 23rd was the playing of the orchestra in Wagner's Overture to Der fliegende Holländer and in Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, both of which were singularly fine performances. Mr. Manns's ability is never so conspicuous as when he is conducting a work of Beethoven's; with Wagner's later style he has less sympathy; but on this occasion the Overture was played admirably. At the same concert Miss Nettie Carpenter gave an extremely clever performance of Saint-Saëns's Violin Concerto, Op. 20, and Fräulein Fillunger sang Mendelssohn's Scena "Infelice" and songs by Brahms and Schubert. The Concert concluded with a quasi-novelty in the shape of Liszt's Symphonic Poem, "Festklänge," a work which will in no way alter the opinion musicians hold as to the very small value of the great pianist's orchestral compositions. It has been heard several times in London, under the conductorship of the late Mr. Walter Bache, and though the performance at Sydenham was very good, the audience was not inclined to receive it with favour, especially as it was placed at the very end of a long programme. It is difficult to understand why upwards of seven pages of the Programme-Book at the concert were devoted to the analysis of Liszt's bombastic music, while Saint-Saëns's scholarly Concerto was not analysed at all. The Symphony at the concert last Saturday was Brahms's beautiful work in D, Op. 73, which Mr. Manns was the first to introduce into England some ten years ago. The performance was not altogether up to the mark, and would have been the better for more rehearsal; the first violins, in particular, were unusually unsteady. Far more satisfactory was the orchestral playing in Weber's Overture to Euryanthe, in Sir Arthur Sullivan's Incidental Music to Macbeth, and in Mr. MacCunn's Orchestral Ballad, "The Ship o' the Fiend." Sir Arthur Sullivan's music, which in its present form had not previously been heard in London, gains by being dissociated from Shakspeare's play, for the situations in which it is hardly strong enough in style to be musically appropriate. Last Saturday the weakest portions—namely, the Preludes to Acts II. and IV., and the two choruses—were omitted. The Overture is much the best number of the work, and created a very favourable impression. The vocalists at this concert were Mr. and Mrs. Henschel, the former of whom sang with much dramatic feeling Lysiat's Scena, "Wo berg ich mich?" from Weber's Euryanthe, besides taking part with Mrs. Henschel in his own charming "Gondoliera," which was enthusiastically encored. Mrs. Henschel also sang "Glöcklein im Thale," from Euryanthe, with all her usual grace and finish.

The Monday and Saturday Popular Concerts which take place before Christmas are never very interesting, and this season they have been no exception to the rule; but at the concert on Monday week Signor Piatti introduced a quaint piece of Old English instrumental music, which was welcome both for its own sake and as affording some relief to the familiar classical repertory. Christopher Simpson, whose Thirteen Divisions on a Ground Signor Piatti has arranged for pianoforte and violoncello, was one of the greatest English theorists of his day; his principal work, A Compendium of Practical Music, passed through no less than nine editions in the century which succeeded its first publication in 1665. His Division-Violist; or, an Introduction to the Playing upon a Ground, from which the Divisions played by Signor Piatti are taken, appeared in 1659; so that Simpson stands as a sort of link between the earlier instrumental writers, such as Gibbons and Coperario, and the later, who, like Locke and Purcell, were more under French and Italian influence. The work played on the 25th ult. is not only very interesting historically, but also possesses considerable character and beauty. It has been admirably arranged by Signor Piatti, and was received with much favour. The successful rescue of this piece from the gulf of oblivion should encourage the distinguished violoncellist to further efforts in the same direction. It would be very interesting to hear occasionally the Fantasies of Gibbons or of John Jenkins, the latter of whom in particular is an interesting musician who is now utterly forgotten. The programme of the same concert included Cherubini's Fifth Posthumous Quartet, which was heard last summer at Sir Charles Hallé's Chamber Concerts. The performance on the earlier occasion was better than that at the Monday Popular Concert. Cherubini's chamber music requires the greatest accuracy and refinement, and in several passages the want of this was apparent, especially in the first-violin part. Miss Fanny Davies was the pianist, and gave a performance of Beethoven's Sonata in D minor, Op. 29, which left much to be desired. Incorrect phrasing and wrong notes were only too conspicuous. Miss Davies has made such progress lately that it seems strange she should fail to play Beethoven's music well. Possibly the habit which Mr. Chappell's audience has of applauding a good, bad, or indifferent performance with an equal amount of enthusiasm may have the effect of making artists careless; but, whatever may be the cause, Miss Davies will do well to study such works as Beethoven's Sonatas more thoroughly before playing them in public before even an uncritical audience. The vocalist was Mme. Belle Cole, who sang Handel's "Lascia ch' io pianga," and a little song, "Le Violette," ascribed in the programme to a Scarlatti, the dates of whose birth and death were stated to be 1650 and 1752 respectively. The mistake is inconceivable; for the song in question is generally assigned to Alessandro Scarlatti, who was born in 1659 and died in 1725. The accompanist on this occasion was new to Popular Concert audiences; but her playing was even more unsatisfactory than usual.

There is no occasion to notice in any detail the performance of Mendelssohn's Elijah, which took place at St. James's Hall on Wednesday week. The work was performed for the benefit of that deserving charity the Royal Society of Musicians, and the artists who took part in it gave their services gratuitously. The solos were sung by Miss Anna Williams, Miss Hilda Wilson, Miss Alice Suter, Messrs. Watkin Mills, Iver M'Kay, A. Thompson, and J. Gibson; the orchestra was led by Mr. Carrodus; the organist was Mr. Fountain Meen; and the performance was excellently conducted by Mr. W. H. Cummings.

The programme of Mr. Henschel's second Symphony Concert was as admirably selected as that of the first, and attracted a larger audience, though the hall was by no means so full as could have been wished and as the general merit of the performances deserved. At the first Symphony Concert the programme was selected so as to afford a survey of instrumental music from Bach to Beethoven; at the second concert the series was continued from

Weber down to Herr Richard Strauss, the very latest musician who has made a name in Germany. Weber was represented by the Overture to Oberon, Schumann by his Fourth Symphony, Wagner by his "Huldigungs-Marsch," and Brahms by the Variations on Haydn's Chorale St. Antonii. The two movements from Herr Strauss's Symphonic Fantasia, "Aus Italien," which were chosen to represent the latest development of orchestral music, were complete novelties to an English audience. Mr. Henschel doubtless was well advised in bringing them forward, for it is only right that English amateurs should be kept acquainted with the newest productions of foreign musicians. It cannot be said that Herr Strauss's music produced a favourable impression. The two movements were (according to the programme) intended to represent respectively scenes on the Campagna and on the shore at Sorrento. The first, an Andante, has some merit, though it is extended to too great a length, and is too diffuse in character. In the second movement, an Andantino, according to the author of the Analytical Programme, "Sunny waters, free, gay, and abounding life, with all the charm of southern shores, are the composer's inspiration, and he abandons himself completely to its influences." If the audience had not been informed of this, very few would have discovered it, for anything duller, more ponderous, and long-winded than this Sorrento movement it would be hard to imagine. The whole work is obviously the production of a young man of talent who, if he has any sterling ability in him, will probably live to be ashamed of it. It is not likely to be heard again in London. The orchestral playing throughout the concert was very good, the performance of the Oberon Overture in particular being noticeable for its vigour and brilliancy. The "Huldigungs-Marsch" was the least satisfactory number; but the composition, striking as it is, always bears signs of having been originally scored for a military band, and in its present form it wants very perfect playing to preserve the necessary balance between the stringed and the brass instruments.

On Wednesday afternoon the first of Mr. and Mrs. Henschel's charming vocal recitals attracted a crowded audience to Prince's Hall. The performance, as is always the case at these concerts, was admirably selected. Beginning with an interesting Duet of Stradella's, the concert-givers sang, in their usual admirable style, songs and duets by Handel, Beethoven, Berlioz, Schubert, Schumann, Mendelssohn, Götz, Liszt, Massenet, and Brahms; while English music was represented by Bishop's "Tell me, my Heart," Mr. Goring Thomas's "A Lake and a Fairy Boat," and Mr. Corder's "O Sun, that wakenest all." It is impossible to signal any one number as better than another; but Mrs. Henschel won most applause by her singing of Massenet's setting of the Serenade from Coppée's Le Passant, to which she responded by singing her husband's beautiful "Spinning Song"; and Mr. Henschel deserves special thanks for introducing so fine and little known a song as Schubert's "Memnon." The second of these interesting performances is announced for next Wednesday.

REVIEWS.

BRITISH REASON IN ENGLISH RHYME.*

THIS book consists of Welsh proverbs and Bardic and legal aphorisms, with translations in English rhyme by the late Henry Halford Vaughan. It is edited by one of his children, and the Welsh has been revised by Professor Rhys. It is difficult to believe that the author of this work can have intended it to appear exactly in its present form. Two thousand five hundred and fifty-nine Welsh sayings, accompanied by decidedly smart translations, are excellent things; but to publish them without a break, and in no sort of order, appears to us a mistake. As they stand one might suppose that they had been written on separate pieces of paper, put into a hat, well shaken, and then drawn out one by one at hazard, and printed as they came. To turn the leaves hurriedly over and find three hundred and seventy-eight pages covered with an unbroken string of short rhymes, mostly couplets, unconnected in any way with each other, is enough to frighten away four readers out of five. Be its matter ever so good, a volume thus made up is wearisome reading. Unfortunately, again, in this form the work is unmanageable as a book of reference. If one wants to find a special passage, there is nothing for it but to look through the pages from cover to cover, as the object of one's search is just as likely to be in one place as in another. At least it might be expected that the work would be divided under the three headings almost suggested in the introductory note—namely, Proverbs, Laws, and Bardic aphorisms. Even this would have been a relief and a convenience; but it is impossible to read the book without noticing that numbers of other headings might have suggested themselves. For instance, there are many little rhymes which might be classed under each of the following:—Admonitions, Allegories, Beggars, Birds, Cattle, Cats, Children, Cowards, Deer, Dogs, Enemies, Failings, Farming, Fire, Fishes, Food, Foxes, Goats, Home, Horses, and so on. We think that it would be very much easier to read the book if the matter had been arranged on some such principle as this; but even as it stands it would be greatly improved by the addition of an index, which would render it serviceable for future reference. The editor says in a brief prefatory note:—"My father had intended to write an introductory essay dealing with the subject as a whole, but at the time of his death this was only just commenced." The absence of this intended introduction is much to be regretted, and it seems a pity that Professor Rhys, who gave his assistance in the revision of the proofs, was not persuaded to write one as a substitute. Nobody could have been more fitted for the task.

It is said, with much truth, that the Welsh hate the English; but it is at least as true that the English do not love the Welsh. We much doubt if nine out of ten English people living in Wales either know or care whether the Welsh have many proverbs or few. As to the majority of Englishmen and English women, all they can tell one about Welsh is that it is a hideous language. They would rather study any other, either living or dead. Of Welsh, Welsh literature, and Welsh customs they know nothing, and do not want to know anything; nor have we much hope that they ever will, unless a Welsh Walter Scott should arise to make Wales, and things appertaining to it, the fashion. If the book which we are reviewing should have the effect of causing them to take the slightest interest in Cymraeg, its author would have laboured to some purpose. Nevertheless, we will say frankly that our fear is not so much lest it should be little read as that readers of a certain class should avail themselves of it too eagerly. We tremble at the thought that there are enterprising people who are likely to learn by heart a number of its proverbs with the view of displaying them in their own honour, as occasion may serve. "Where is that from?" they will be asked. "Oh! it is an old Welsh proverb," will be the reply. "Confound these slippery floors," some one will say; and then the student of British Reason will come out with, "Better rough stones, whose hindrance oft offends me, than even slabs, whose smoothness headlong sends me." Those who want to do this sort of thing, however, had better be quick about it, or, as the book becomes better known, they will run terrible risks of being found out; and we advise people who may hear any apt quotations of Welsh proverbs within the next few months to ask the speakers what they think of Vaughan's British Reason in English Rhyme; when, if it is possible to raise a blush to the cheek of a hardened cribber and quoter, a blush will be seen.

Women do not appear to have been at all overestimated by the ancient Welsh. The pleasure of looking at a pretty wife would be qualified if the husband ever kept in mind the saying that "Though long the chance may lag," she "weekly alters to a hag." As to confiding in her, "Often you may trust your life, your secret never, to your wife." The happiest state would seem to be not to have one at all; for "take no wife, have no strife," say the ungallant Welsh. A Welshman who had once owned one, remarked bitterly, "Never yet by any cur, was I barked at as by her." But no heed should be given to the barking of wives; for "Off like the wind flies woman's word, as like the wind let it be heard." Nor should more attention be given to their promises; "Default will the performance be of what a woman promised thee," and "Nothing earthly hath a way, like a woman to betray." When our wives say, "For goodness' sake don't bother me. Let me do what I like; I know what is best for me," we—that is to say, those of us who have the pluck—are to reply, "My dear, remember that the old Celtic bard says, 'A woman mostly will prefer the thing that is the worst for her.'" It is not, however, the word of a woman only that is to be distrusted in Wales, as it is the boast of Welshmen that "It never will do to say all that is true." In one sense this proverb cannot be gainsaid; but it is given a very wide signification in the Principality. And, after all, men as well as women can be disagreeable in Welsh families; for they admit that "To be vexed by his love makes a kite of a dove," especially, we may add, when the kite has had what the Welsh themselves call "a trop off peer." Nor are all the uncomplimentary Welsh saws addressed to females. "If an angel when you roam, be no devil in your home," is probably aimed at the sterner sex. Even children appear to have been regarded from a pessimist point of view by the Welsh bards. "The kid, on which at birth you dote, daily coarsens to a goat."

We have only detected one case in the whole volume of flagrant repetition, although we will not guarantee that there are no others. The proverb Blaengar ymudrawdd ffol is given twice, as No. 1,560 and as No. 2,099. In the first instance it is translated "Unchecked by doubt, a fool speaks out," and in the second by "Fools speak without reserve or doubt." The author thought well to render one translation in Latin; but he would have done better to remember that the knowledge of that language is not exclusively confined to males. Welsh bards are celebrated for their triads, and any quantity of them are to be found in this volume. Most of them begin after some such fashion as the following:—"Bards are we for purposes three"; "Three things to do words should not fail"; "Within three spheres our life is ranging"; "Of men there are three kinds," and so on. This reminds us of a celebrated Welsh scholar who wrote a poem on the Triad of Ugly Women in his country—for private circulation! As a specimen of the author's method of translating a Welsh proverb into English rhyme, and the manner in which the English and Welsh are set on the pages, we will quote

If we're to go,
Then be it so.

O down ni
Ni a ddown.

Some of the advice in these old proverbs is excellent, such as "Be happy and gay thy natural way"; "Set not thine own price so high that men shall doubt if they need buy"; and, at any rate the first part of, "Preach not sermons over meat; when you worship, do not eat." In respect to meat, again, there is a proverb which we could have aptly quoted on many occasions, had we known it. It runs—"Reville not the meat which you heartily eat." Modern farmers have learnt to qualify the saying "The shelter which a hedge supplies outwards the ground it occupies"; nor would men of science any longer allow that "The skin in which he first drew breath, a wolf will carry to his death"; it does not always follow, again, that "A hog that's squealing the knife is feeling," and the theory that "After drink, the spirits sink," is quite new to us. But most of the proverbs are beyond dispute. True enough are the following—"Fool more ridiculous was never than the fool who thinks he's clever"; "Words noisy and grand, and a mouse is at hand"; "The way that is the best to go, is the way that best you know"; and "He who a horse has of his own, is welcome to a horse on loan." With regard to a hired horse, we find the following cruel couplet—"On, on, thou tired brute we've hired."

As might be expected, very many of the proverbs here given are familiar in English also, and in many cases in other languages as well. For instance, nobody will have much difficulty in supplying the English prototypes of the following. "Every dunghill dog is bold when on his own dunghill roll'd"; "The moment when the cat departs, gives back to mice their merry hearts"; "Let dogs that sleep their slumbers keep"; "No risk has he run: no prize has he won"; "Brothers in trade, or good, or ill, are seldom brothers in good will"; "Out of sight, forgotten quite"; "Examine not the horse's eye, which with your thanks alone you buy"; "Three things do no good 'till they're knocked on the crown, a wedge, tether stake, and a lubberly clown"; "Who makes most haste, time most doth waste"; "A rolling stone no moss can own"; "The hap which I rue, is good fortune to you"; "He who to church the nearest lies, will furthest be from Paradise"; "One bird in hand is twice as good as the two plumpest in the wood"; "Who loveth me, my dog love he"; "If on two stools a man will sit, ere long his limbs the floor will hit"; or, "Rome's building was a work not done between sunrise and set of sun." It would be easy to go on multiplying examples.

Biblical cribbings may be recognized among some of the rhymes, such as "When blind to blind his guidance lends, in some deep pool their journey ends," and "By his fruit the man soon showeth the kind of root from which he groweth"; on the other hand, "Be your pity but small for the fool, who gave all" rather contravenes the Christian counsel of perfection. Ideas expressed by poets other than Welsh may be traced in "Better of roebucks to be first than amongst antler'd stags the worst"; "Half the room in hell's allow'd to good actions vainly vow'd"; "He on the fight has most to say, who in the fight will run away"; "The house, that has no child within it, is a house with nothing in it," and in many other passages. Lastly, we will refrain from passing an adverse criticism on the Cambrian proverb—"As into years a Welshman goes, more foolish year by year he grows."

NOVELS.*

MR. PERCY HULBURD, if we may judge by the novel In Black and White, which bears his name on the title-page, has selected for his models in composition some recent American writers of fiction who look upon themselves, we believe, as a "school," and consider that they have taken a new departure. It is a departure that the world can willingly part withal; and it is a road which will lead to no goal. Worse guides for a young and clever writer, as Mr. Hulburd apparently is, could not be. Cleverness, unsupported by common sense, is apt to waste itself in erratic spasm, and common sense would never choose to follow the footsteps of these foolish and pretentious posers, who, looking in the glass of their own conceit, see themselves as philosophic students of humanity. In the novel now in question we are invited to attend to what is meant to be a profound psychological analysis conveyed in the history of one of the feeblest, meanest, shabbiest creatures ever presented in fiction. Mr. Robert Dillon is a clerk in a bank. He has a remarkable facility for copying drawings, and imitating other people's signatures. He is by way of being honest, so far as so feeble a being can be honest, until a fellow-clerk, a German, one day delivers to him a farrago of bombastic nonsense, "a programme to solve the difficulties of existence by freeing every man from the trammels of conflicting influences, thus restoring equilibrium in the balance of life." The details of this simple little scheme are vague, except that they include forgery and fraud on the part of Dillon, instigated by his fellow-clerk. Dillon is converted to these ideas with a readiness only equalled by the famous effect on my Lord of Natal of the words of the Zulu, his pal. He forges names all round, and gains wealth and position; forges letters by which he cheats his friend out of his promised wife, and marries her himself—commits, in fine, every sort of baseness and cowardly crime. This story, which is simply that of Jim the Penman, is wrapped in a cloud of fine phrases, mystical maunderings, and philosophic speculations, in which the reader is as much lost as the writer. At the back of it all there is no real knowledge of the world, no broad survey of the field of human nature, no penetrating sense of human motive or of the immutable limits of human faculty. To compare such stuff with real analytic power would be to compare oakum-picking in a cell to the work of Pasteur in his laboratory. Mr. Hulburd is fluent, and believes himself to be eloquent. Were we to take him at his own estimate, we should be frequently pulled up short by singular lapses:—"Leaving it undecided whether hereditary traits are really lineal transmissions, or only the fruit of childhood's intuitive assimilation of surrounding influences" is a specimen of phrases in which words have tempted to the betrayal of meaning. "Drawing on post-mortal experience" and "invites to repiction" are others. Over and over again the blunder between "to lie" and "to lay" is repeated, the literary blunder the most suggestive and indicative of ignorance or vulgarity. Many other traces of carelessness are to be seen in the book which it is useless here to indicate, and traces of something worse than carelessness, which we do not care further to refer to. It is a bad specimen of a bad school, and it matters little, for school and specimens are equally self-doomed to oblivion.

Whether or not enjoyment is to be got from the perusal of Alderdene depends entirely on the reader's docility in giving his mind over for the time being to the keeping of Major Norris Paul. If he will allow himself to be whirled along the stream of that lively writer's narrative without question or doubting, he may have a pleasant two hours over the volume. In the first twelve hours we have a terrific storm, a shipwreck, and a salvage of two out of the whole crew of the Spanking Susan, a scramble into a smuggler's Black Hole, a fratricide, the birth of a heroine, the death of the heroine's mother, and the mysterious interment of the mangled body of a baronet. How it is that baronets are so invariably mixed up in shady transactions in fiction, either as principals or victims, it is difficult to explain. It must have something to do with their bloody hands. As Major Paul's story has to go on for eighteen years before the baby born on that remarkable night can be married to the hero, we tremble for the author's powers of staying. But there is no need. By the help of scheming stewards, smart young soldiers, conscience-stricken murderers, a ghost or two, subterranean knockings, and faces in the fire, we do very well indeed, especially as now and then the strain of attention is relieved by the introduction of long yarns which have no bearing on the plot of Alderdene whatever. Major Paul's style in his graver passages recalls the memory of the venerable G. P. R. James, but he has also his funny interludes, in which he is genuinely amusing.

Novels so amusing, so brightly written, so full of simple sense and witty observation as Sir Charles Danvers are not found every day. It is a novel of society, written by one who knows English society well, and judges men and women with sagacity and the tolerance born of comprehension. The story is one of love, quite properly so, even passionate love, and the emotions of the three people (there must be three, or, at any rate, an uneven number, or where are your complications?) are touched with the reticence and restrained strength, to borrow a phrase from the language of theatrical criticism, which have so much stronger an effect than exuberance. Ruth Deyncourt is a delightful girl, and her passages of flirtation with Sir Charles, he gradually growing in earnestness, she fencing with an adversary whom she believes to be merely amusing himself, are excellent. Just the right touches from outsiders are put in to alarm Ruth's pride, and urge her, along with other natural and praiseworthy motives, to accept the offer of the fantastic Dare, and then, too late, Charles throws off the mask of levity and shows her his heart. Out of this situation, of course, they do not come without grievous woes; but they do come, and then, when they are at the very summit of accomplished joy, they resume, in the most amusing way, the tone of persiflage under which it suits both natures best to half conceal emotion. It is a charming love-story, lightened up on all sides by the humorous, genial, character-sketches of less important personages. There is a bewitching child who worships Sir Charles. "You are, as a rule, so surrounded and encompassed on every side by Molly," complains Ruth; but the reader never has too much of Molly. There is not enough of any of them, in fact; and, for a wonder, we want the third volume the author has denied us.

A short note to the "revised edition" of With the Harrises states that the novel was originally published anonymously under the slightly different title of The Harrises. There is no name attached to the present volume, but it is attributed on the front page to the author of The Subaltern, so that we presume there is no secrecy about its being the work of the Rev. Mr. Gleig. It is a little late in the day to begin to criticize the writings of Mr. Gleig, which may not be much read by the rising generation, but are perfectly well known to most of that one which has crossed the brow of the hill and has the setting sun before it. That the book should have been published anonymously while any immediate connexions of the Holland family survive is easy to understand, much easier, in fact, than to explain why it should have been written. The cir-circumstances connected with the third Lord Holland's marriage are, it is true, now so familiar that the details have ceased to be regarded as a scandalous matter. Still, the taste of raking them up to make a novel out of them is, to say the least, questionable; and the author of The Subaltern has further woven an invented or recorded imbroglio of a sinister kind about them. According to his version, the marriage of Lord and Lady Holland—which some strait-laced people never regarded as a marriage at all, though a legal ceremony had been gone through—had in reality no legal existence whatever. If the part of the novel relating to the foreign young lady, her early marriage to Lord Beltone, and her child, be a romance, it is an impertinence to introduce it into the lives of people perfectly well known, and who make part of English social history. If it be not a romance, it is a grave offence against decency to blazon it forth in the pages of a novel. It affects to attach a stigma to the birth of the man whose widow has just sunk into her grave. Names and a few insignificant details have been changed, but that Lord and Lady Holland, their children, and the famous circle at Holland House, are minutely described is plain. If the author, whose bright, graphic, animated writing fitted him admirably for the task, had confined himself to reproducing that brilliant society as it was known to exist, no one could have objected. Memoirs and autobiographies of London life seventy years ago have, it is true, given us about as much as we want of the men and women who figured in it; and we could dispense with any more stories about "Lady Selina Kidd"—a specimen of the deep disguises of names affected by the writer of With the Harrises. But such a work would have been inoffensive, which this one certainly is not.

SHIPBUILDING.*

THIS stately volume is, in all respects, a worthy successor to the many which have preceded it. It would be, perhaps, too much to say that it excels them all, but it certainly seems to equal the best of them, both in the variety of subjects treated and in the manner of dealing with them. As our readers are probably aware, the papers read at the annual meeting of the Institution are followed by discussions, in which strangers are occasionally allowed to take part, and these debates are very often models which other Societies and bodies would do well to follow. In spite of the complex nature of the subjects treated, prolixity and diffuseness are obviously unpopular and discouraged. Clearness of statement is aimed at and usually attained, except by a few puzzle-headed mathematical theorists, who, much exercised by the desire to be profound, only succeed in being obscure. Personality and acrimony are extremely rare, although there is no want of candour. That there should be candour, however, is only natural, and to be expected. Many of those who examine and criticize the papers are men who have devoted their lives to the study of shipbuilding, theoretical and practical, and are largely interested in it; and it is tolerably certain then that they will say what they think; and what they think is sure to be worth attention. Few, indeed, of those who read papers in public have to address an audience so competent to pronounce judgment as that over which Lord Ravensworth presides.

As has just been indicated, an unusually large variety of subjects are treated in the present volume; but valuable as it is, it must be said that a portion of the matter it contains is somewhat out of date. The first part of the well edited and elaborately illustrated book is occupied with an account of the proceedings at a meeting held at Glasgow in July 1888. Making every possible allowance for the extreme care which is necessary in preparing the work for publication, this does seem somewhat tardy production, and to notice these papers now would be to imitate one of the very few faults which mark the Transactions; and it may be added that, with the exception of a description of the Clyde and a brief history of the marine steam-engine, the contributions to this first part are not of any special weight. The second and larger part contains an account of the proceedings of the Society at the meeting in London in April last, and, considering that they only met on three days, a wonderful amount of work the Naval Architects certainly managed to do. On the afternoons and evenings of the 10th, 11th, and 12th they heard and discussed papers, some of which might well be called short treatises, on fifteen different subjects. To notice all these, however briefly, within the limits of space at our command would obviously be impossible. Little more than a catalogue could be given; three are therefore selected as being, for the general reader at all events, more interesting than the others, valuable as some of these are.

The paper most worthy of note in the Transactions, inasmuch as it deals with a matter vitally affecting our existence as a nation, is undoubtedly that of Mr. W. H. White, the head of the constructive department of the Admiralty, on "The Designs of the New Battle-Ships." Here again, however, the difficulty just noted arises. The matter in one sense seems a little obsolete. The paper itself and the criticisms it evoked were commented on immediately; and, moreover, the ever-shifting art of designing war-ships, once the most stationary, now the most changeful of all the mechanical arts, has had a new complication added to it since the naval architects met in the Adelphi. Notwithstanding these facts, however, Mr. White's paper is so admirable, and the discussion which followed it was so weighty, that it is imperative to speak of them, although the notice of a subject which has been so fully treated must necessarily be brief.

There is one very simple fact with regard to naval architecture which might be thought as obvious as the product of two and two, but which is nevertheless frequently ignored not only by those critics who have no knowledge of the subject, but also, strange to say, by some experts. A designer when planning a vessel of any given size has only a limited amount of weight at his disposal, which, as we need hardly say, is equal to the tons of salt-water the vessel displaces. On this weight, which he has to apportion, there are, so to speak, many demands. The constructor of a war-ship must allot so much to the hull, so much to the engines, so much to the coal, so much to the armament and ammunition and stores, and so much to the armour, if the vessel is an ironclad, or, to be quite accurate, a steel-and-iron-clad. If with regard to any one of these requisites he allows too much, the ship will have to suffer in some other respect. In the Blake just launched, for instance, enormous speed and great coal endurance have, it is hoped, been attained; but, then, side-armour has been sacrificed altogether. Now, extraordinary as it may seem, this fact, which we have almost insulted our readers by stating, is constantly overlooked, more or less, in discussions respecting warships, and specially in discussions respecting armour-protection. Sir E. Reed does not, of course, overlook it. So skilled a naval architect would be as likely to overlook the force of gravitation; but he does not give it anything like the prominence he ought to, and sometimes it seems to be altogether ignored by the advocates of great defensive power. To read some of the disquisitions which appear, it might be thought that compound plates were imponderable, or that a ship was like a fort on which practically as much iron and steel as may be desired can be bolted. The protection of ships must be limited; and, if it is carried too far, the offensive power will have to be lessened, probably with the most lamentable results. Can anything be imagined more pitiable than the position of a helpless warship unable to do harm to the antagonists who are striving to batter her to death? Of what avail would the hide of the rhinoceros be to the lion if his teeth were drawn and his claws cut.

Now, with regard to armour, the problem set before the Admiralty constructors has long been difficult, and is at present difficult in the extreme. The constantly increasing power of guns has made it more and more necessary to thicken the armour, and in consequence more and more to limit it, and now the portion of the ship which can be protected is but small, and even that is not protected against the heaviest guns. The Admiralty have had to balance offensive against defensive power, and, from the debate that followed the reading of Mr. White's paper, in which experts of the highest rank addressed an audience of experts, it seems clear that, with regard to the vessels last designed, they have done so well. Sir E. Reed, in his attack on the officials, was telling, as he always is, and he certainly made a point when he showed the danger which an ironclad might incur if, in rolling, the thin skin below the armour-plates were exposed to an enemy's shot; but, on the whole, his one-sided arguments did not succeed, and the Admiralty distinctly had the best of it, the opinion of those who spoke with the greatest weight clearly being that Mr. White and his subordinates had, so far as was possible, reconciled contradictory conditions with very exceptional skill.

Next in importance to Mr. White's paper is perhaps that of Professor V. B. Lewes on "The Corrosion and Fouling of Iron and Steel Ships," of which it may be said with truth that it is at once very excellent and very disappointing; excellent, because the subject is dealt with in so lucid and masterly a manner; disappointing, because it is most discouraging to find that, in a matter of such vital importance to the Royal Navy and to the mercantile marine, there has only been such very moderate progress; but unfortunately it seems clear that far less has been done than is generally supposed, and with regard to the navy the case appears to be deplorable, though not, as will be seen, from any fault of the Admiralty. In order to make the subject intelligible to those who have not given it any attention, it should be explained that two kinds of composition are applied to the bottoms of iron and steel ships. One is called the anti-corrosive, and, as its name denotes, is meant to prevent rusting. The other is called anti-fouling, and its object is to prevent marine growths, animal and vegetable, on the ship's skin under water. With regard to the first of these two, which, as need hardly be said, is put on before the other, it would appear that a very fair measure of success has been obtained. Mr. Lewes enumerates five different classes of them. The first consists of "boiled linseed oil mixed with red or white lead"; the second, of "tar and tar products" and "asphalts and mineral waxes"; the third, of varnishes formed by dissolving gums or resins in volatile solvents; and the fourth, of varnishes of this kind to which body has been given by the addition of foreign constituents, generally mineral oxides. The fifth class consists of cement coatings; but these have apparently been abandoned; and, according to the writer, there can be little doubt that the second and fourth classes are the best. If care is taken to make sure of the purity of the materials used in these compositions, and if they are applied to perfectly dry plates which have previously been scraped free from rust, or, if they are new, been "pickled with dilute acid" "and then washed down with some slightly alkaline liquid," "little apprehension need be felt as to the effect of corrosion on a ship's bottom," to use Professor Lewes's words. The problem, then, of finding a satisfactory anti-corrosive coating for the out-sides of the bottoms of iron and steel ships has been practically solved. Unfortunately, the facts are very different with regard to anti-fouling compositions.

Efforts infinite have been made to protect iron ships from marine growths. Laudably simple were the first attempts. Copper was applied to vessels of this kind in much the same way that it was to wooden ones, it not being apparently understood that copper was electro-negative to iron. The result was as simple as the charming process itself. Galvanic action was set up; the water was decomposed and the oxygen was thrown on to the iron, which rotted away like a jerry-builder's timber. It was much the same thing as if a man had covered a house with stucco which contained some material that destroyed the bricks. At a far later date an attempt was made to get over the difficulty by the use of zinc, to which iron is electro-negative, and a sheeting of this metal was placed sometimes on un-caulked wooden sheathing; sometimes, we believe, on the iron skin itself. The idea was an ingenious one, but Professor Lewes shows clearly that zinc has been a failure. When in no long time it had been ascertained that copper could not be used, it was necessary to devise some means of preventing the rapid fouling of iron bottoms, and in 1840 the first anti-fouling paint was patented. Since then there have been patents innumerable, and there are now thirty-two compositions in the market; but from that day to this the problem has never been satisfactorily solved. Modern chemistry does not often fail, if time enough is allowed, but here certainly it cannot be said to have succeeded.

The reasons for this want of success Mr. Lewes explains very thoroughly. The "anti-foulers" have been supposed to "owe a considerable portion of their value to their" poisonous action "on marine animal and vegetable growths." This action, however, is much less potent than is generally supposed. It is only in the early stages of the growth that the poison destroys it. Once developed, it is proof, for the very simple reason that the portion of it which adheres to the ship is used to cling on with only, the constituents necessary for development being derived from the sea-water. Owing to this fact, the paint in which poisons are relied upon is apt to fail. It has to be made by mixing them with varnish, and for a time the varnish keeps them from the sea-water, or the sea-water from them, whichever phrase may be preferred. During this period deposits are formed, and, when the poison is liberated by the disintegration of the vehicle, the growth can no longer be affected. There are, therefore, very grave objections to anti-foulers of this class; but with others of a different kind more success has been achieved. It has been thought that the immunity given by copper was due to its exfoliation, and attempts have been made to imitate this, and to provide a coating which "shall slowly work off," and "so expose a continually renewed surface"; and these seem to be more effective than the others, but there are grave drawbacks to them also. The coating which will keep the vessel clean for months in harbour will waste away very rapidly at sea, and leave her bare; and if, to avoid this, the manufacturer makes the composition harder, the vessel fouls while she is stationary, as, in the absence of friction, the coating does not wash away with sufficient rapidity. Hence these compositions are much better suited to merchant ships always steaming at fixed rates, and staying the shortest possible time in harbour, than to war-ships, which go at varying speeds, and often remain at rest for long intervals; and this is a fact which is well worthy of attention. The management of our navy is much criticized, sometimes justly, but sometimes unjustly; and it should certainly be borne in mind that, with the hulls as with the boilers and engines, there are grave difficulties which are not anything like so serious in the mercantile marine.

It is pleasant to turn from Professor Lewes's well-written but not very comforting paper to Mr. Thornicroft's account of his water-tube boiler, which seems to give the promise of a great advance, although his arguments were severely handled by his candid and competent critics. The idea, as need hardly be said, is by no means a new one. As long ago as 1860 it occurred to engineers that great advantages might be gained by, so to speak, reversing the principle of the marine boiler, and, instead of passing the flame through tubes surrounded by water, to put the water in tubes and let the flame heat these, and at a later time boilers constructed according to this idea were fitted to various merchant vessels. With some they were failures, a very lamentable result being produced in one case; with others they seem to have succeeded fairly well; but marine engineers, not without good cause, distrusted them, and after a comparatively short time they were all but abandoned. Now Mr. Thornicroft thinks that he has overcome the difficulties that stood in the way, and contrived a water-tube boiler that can be trusted; and with regard to small vessels making short runs, after which everything can be examined, he certainly seems to have succeeded fairly well. Whether, however, his steam-generator is suited for large sea-going ships is a very different question. If it can be rendered suitable for such vessels the water-tube boiler will assuredly be largely used, as it has great advantages over the tank boiler. Steam can be got up much more quickly, it will work with somewhat less fuel, and, most important of all, it is very much lighter than the other, thus giving a large increase to the carrying power. At present, however, its defects appear to be very serious. Soot and dirt accumulate round the tubes, causing external corrosion, and constant watching and cleaning, more careful than can be expected from ordinary stokers, are necessary. Worse than this, the tubes, from some cause not apparently very clearly understood, are liable to "pitting," resulting in small holes, which, as need hardly be said, are dangerous in the extreme. These grave evils Mr. Thornicroft believes that he has been able, to a certain extent, to overcome, and though, as has been indicated, his invention was mercilessly handled by his brother naval architects, he spoke with modest confidence at the end of the debate, and, it should be observed, without any of the pique which inventors too often show when their pet ideas have been roughly treated. He clearly is not discouraged, and has continued to labour at the subject, as on the 21st of last month, half a year after the meeting of the Naval Architects, he read a paper on it at the Institution of Civil Engineers. It is much to be hoped that he will succeed. The introduction of a water-tube boiler suited for sea-going ships will be the greatest step made for many years in marine engineering, and will specially aid those who are charged with the onerous task of constructing our war-ships.

THE ARUNDEL SOCIETY'S PUBLICATIONS.

SOME very interesting additions to the Arundel Society's fine reproductions after frescoes and paintings of the old Italian masters have lately been distributed to subscribers and are now offered to the public. In the first place we must note four new "occasional publications." These comprise two chromolithographs after the Convent frescoes by Fra Angelico at Florence—"The Presentation in the Temple" and "The Entombment"—executed, from drawings by Signor Costantini, by Herr Wilhelm Greve, of Berlin; and two heliographs in monochrome by MM. Lemerrier, of Paris, after Andrea del Sarto's frescoes in the court of the Compagnia dello Scalzo at Florence—"St. John the Baptist Preaching" and "Charity"—from drawings by Signor Mariannecci and Herr Kaiser. The Angelico prints are beautiful examples of reproduction in colour, equal in all respects to the six plates previously published by the Society, and forming with them a most attractive selection from the charming designs of Angelico in the old Dominican convent. The frescoes by Andrea del Sarto, two noble examples of the master, are successfully rendered by the process known as heliogravure, the smaller one, the lovely group symbolizing "Charity," being especially notable as a specimen of felicitous translation. With the admirable result before us we are inclined to doubt whether, in some instances, and with a good water-colour drawing to work upon, the process is not better suited than chromolithography to the reproduction of old and partially damaged frescoes. Much depends upon the condition of the work, still more upon the artist's claim to rank among the colourists. Defrauded of colour, an Angelico could not but be a distasteful reproduction. A far more complex scheme of colour is presented by Botticelli's charming "Primavera," the allegorical picture of Spring, "delighting and delighted," in the Fine Arts Academy at Florence, a chromolithograph of which, executed by Herr Greve, from a drawing by Signor Costantini, forms the "first annual publication" of the Society for last year. An ample field for reproductive skill is supplied by the landscape and figures—the rich yet sombre grove of orange-trees, with their fruit, "golden lamps in a green night," the fresh sward brilliant with jewel-like flowers, the radiant Venus, the quaint, flower-decked Flora, the beautiful and melancholy Graces dancing to a stately measure. The result is not, indeed, impeccable tone and harmony, yet a print of remarkable decorative quality, and as sympathetic as it is conceivable the reproductive process can yield. For the present year the "first annual publication" consists of Carpaccio's "Calling of St. Matthew," in the chapel of San Giorgio dei Schiavoni, and Bazzi's "Christ bound," from the mutilated fresco of the "Flagellation" at Siena. Neither of these chromolithographs can be numbered among Herr Greve's successful prints. The former, which we cannot regard as a masterpiece, is somewhat hot in colour. Bazzi's fresco, as here reproduced, is yet more unpleasant in colour, and we cannot but think that the admirable modelling, the dignity and pathos of this impressive figure, could be more happily reproduced in monochrome.

TWO GREAT WRITERS.*

DR. GARNETT'S contribution on Milton to the "Great Writers" series is one of the best of that series and of the author's works in writing and arrangement; but we can hardly call it one of the most critical. Indeed, though we are unfortunately, or fortunately (for it may be looked on either way), condemned to take a more grudging and ephectic attitude, we cannot help feeling a certain delight at the thoroughgoing enthusiasm with which Dr. Garnett, a mature man of much and good letters, has thrown himself into the task of defending and exalting Milton through thick and thin. Were he not both too good-natured and too little given to braggadocio, we could imagine him adopting Ali's famous threat, and menacing any one who denies Milton's perfections either as man or bard with cleaving of the skull and dashing out of the teeth, and all the rest of it. But, being what he is, Dr. Garnett has behaved otherwise, and greatly as we are constrained to differ with him on Milton's personal merits, and even on part of his literary character, there are but one or two points on which we are not quite content to differ. One of these is his adoption of the absolutely imaginary depreciation of Mary Powell—the hardest case of the kind, except Harriet Shelley's, in literary history. There is not one single piece of positive evidence against her, and the one piece of positive evidence, Phillips's testimony, makes decidedly in her favour. So do all the probabilities and inferences from the Divorce tracts downwards. That she made a great mistake in marrying Milton is evident; but if that is to be damning proof against a girl of seventeen, God help us all! For the "dulness and commonness," as Mr. Pattison has it (and we may note with justifiable amusement that Pattison's biography, a piece of hero-worship if ever there was one, does not go far nearly enough for Dr. Garnett), we have nothing but a gratuitous construction placed on what may be merely general words, and what are in any case the words of a person far too closely concerned to be impartial. For her having poisoned her daughters' minds against their father we have sheer conjecture, as unsubstantial as any vision. That girls who were subjected to the hideous dull drudgery which we know was their lot, and who could estimate their father's gratitude and affection by his thinking "instruction in embroidery" a sufficient portion for them after years of such drudgery, should be inspired with much affection for him would be the wonderful thing.

The fact is, however, that Dr. Garnett can see no faults in Milton as a man, and few as a writer. He does not agree with Milton's religious views, but he is quite angry with Mr. Pattison for wishing that Milton had not held them, or spent so much time in writing about them. He admits (as, indeed, he could not but admit) the scurrility of the dispute with Salmasius and Morus, but he takes little or no notice of the relatively greater and infinitely more unprovoked scurrility of the earlier attacks on Bishop Hall and others. The defence that this is mere "common form" of the time is, of course, obvious, but it is by no means valid. We may, indeed, give Milton the benefit of the indulgence accorded to Naamans generally who bow in the temple of any Rimmon, but this indulgence at once destroys his claim to exceptional beauty and nobility of character. And that any one should make such a claim for him is a curious instance of the Fallacia Admiracionis—not the most discreditable of fallacies certainly, but certainly also one of the most fallacious.

We have said that Dr. Garnett seems to us on much surer ground as to the literary aspect of the question. As to that, indeed, though there may be differences of detail and relative valuation, there cannot be much general disagreement nowadays between any two persons who have, as Dr. Garnett has, the root of the matter in them. One man's "liking" for Milton, even as a poet, may lag behind his admiration; with another admiration and liking may keep exact step. But in the admiration due to the "master of harmonies" in verse and prose there can be no measure but the measure of critical comparison. We do not think Dr. Garnett admires Milton in the least too much; though perhaps he may admire some others to whom he refers a little too little. He acknowledges frankly the terrible lack of humour in his idol—acknowledges it more frankly than Mr. Pattison, who, master as he was himself of a certain dry irony and sarcasm, lacked most of the sap, if little of the salt, of the humourist. Dr. Garnett's remarks on that very thorny question, the authorship of Eikon Basilike, are excellently shrewd and fair; and this we say with something of an inclination to the view which is not his. But, indeed, agreement or disagreement with the views of a person who expresses those views with Dr. Garnett's fairness, shrewdness, and scholarship cannot much affect the estimate of a sound critic. Only we should like to ask Dr. Garnett this question. If he happened to know what we know of Milton personally, knowing at the same time nothing of Paradise Lost, Comus, Lycidas, and so forth, would he think his Milton an agreeable man? Verily, we trow not.

Mr. Rolleston duly acknowledges his indebtedness to those English predecessors—Mr. James Sime and Miss Helen Zimmern—whose work on Lessing preceded his some ten years ago. A ten years' interval would justify a fresh handling, even if Mr. Rolleston's book were not, as it is, conceived on a different scale and with a different aim. Few people will dispute the claim of the author of the Laocoon to a place among great writers, though perhaps Mr. Rolleston's zeal has a very little outrun his discretion. He deserves, however, the credit of generally letting Discretion—a steady-going beast with plenty of bottom—catch up the sparts of that "hot jade, but soon tired" Zeal. As we began each of his descriptions and laudations of the three plays, Minna von Barnhelm, Emilia Galotti, and Nathan der Weise, we shook our head over Mr. Rolleston. For the fact is that these famous works cannot endure for a moment any kind of criticism which does not make an immense and illegitimate historical allowance. We do not ourselves like the application of harsh words to the work of great men such as Lessing undoubtedly was. But if any rudesby declares that Minna von Barnhelm is artificial and trivial; that the catastrophe of Emilia Galotti is partly preposterous and partly unsavoury in its picture of a young lady who asks her father to murder her, not because she fears violence, but because she feels too liquorish to withstand temptation, and a father who complies; and that Nathan der Weise is a dull and dreary sermon, we shall feel very hard bested to put that rudesby down. But Mr. Rolleston, it would appear, is a kind of inverted Balaam; he comes to bless and remains to curse. After praising Minna heartily, he admits that "it is no profound study of human nature," and that "the characters are manufactures rather than creations." He deplores "the want of any adequate or natural motive" for the dénouement of Emilia Galotti, and is disturbed by the change in the character of the heroine. He says that "Lessing himself should have taught us better than to call Nathan a good drama." A la bonne heure; the court is with him. We can hardly say quite so much of his treatment of his hero's theological exertations. Lessing's behaviour as to the Reimarus fragments appears to us rather questionable, whether we take him to have been an enemy or a friend of Christianity. And instead of his having, as Mr. Rolleston thinks, ushered in and shown the example of a new and exalted conception of religion, we should say that no man did more to bring about (what Mr. Rolleston tells us he himself detested as "an outrage at once on veracity and logic") the attempt to "rationalize doctrines which, whether revealed by God or invented by man, had never appealed to common sense." But Mr. Rolleston, though he may use exaggerated expressions about single critical works of Lessing, does not, and indeed cannot, exaggerate Lessing's general position as a critic. With Diderot, he was simply the founder of modern criticism; and the obligations which each had to any predecessor of any kind were exceedingly small. He had however, unlike Diderot, who was the most good-natured and placable of men, a double and treble portion of the acrimony which is supposed to be, if not essential to the critical temperament, a rarely separable accident of it. Where Mr. Rolleston applies to his controversial censorship terms which would be strong for a Swift doubled with a Voltaire, and both of them trimmed with a Bentley, we should rather say that Lessing did the more polemical part of his business with a great deal of scholarship, with some French wit, and with more German Derbheit. But it was not in any of these things that his real greatness lay. It was in the high criticism of Laocoon, of the Hamburgische Dramaturgie, and of other work, with parts of which we may disagree, in a good deal of which we must wish to "add and eke," but which, as a whole, stands almost alone for originality and power combined.

Mr. Rolleston, however much we may differ with him in detail, gives an excellent account of Lessing's work, and he gives a still better account of the man and his life. Here also he may be a little too fond. Except in the brief space of his happy marriage with Eva König, Lessing had little of the comforts of life. He was never well off, and he was never a good manager even of what he had, being on a smaller scale and with much more excuse as inveterately merged are alieno as Steele himself. In some respects, too, he seems to have been quite as much of a wasp as of a bee, and his expectation that he should be allowed, as Librarian of the Duke of Brunswick, to issue unchecked, uncensored, through the ducal press, not merely the Reimarus fragments, not merely his comments on them, but his private polemics with his adversaries, was simply preposterous. But he was a man who was always best in prosperity, and (contrary to some theories) we hold that that is not the worst sort of man. He seems, indeed, to have been rather deficient in variety of tastes; his fierce book-hunger being only tempered by a fancy for gambling (which did him neither harm nor good) and by the late, and as it would seem almost solitary, attachment—it was hardly a passion—for Eva. He did not care for politics, he ostentatiously disclaimed patriotism, he did not care for nature; he seems, save as regards the theatre, not to have cared much, except theoretically, for art. But he was a stout fighter, an original and fertile thinker, a great writer, and a manly man. Happy he of whom as much can be said.

OXFORD AND CAMBRIDGE.*

IN bringing out cheaper editions of Mr. Andrew Lang's Oxford and Mr. J. W. Clark's Cambridge, the publishers have made the companion volumes in every respect externally pleasing. They should not, however, have put 1890 on the title-pages without some intimation that the volumes are re-issues. Moreover, in the absence of any notice to the contrary, we imagine that they have not given the authors the opportunity of revising their work, and, if so, they are certainly to blame. As it happens, this is no great matter so far as the public is concerned, for any flaws—if any such exist—are of a microscopic character. Although their subjects have so much in common, there is little likeness between the two books. Mr. Lang gives us the spirit of Oxford life at different periods; Mr. Clark dwells chiefly on the stones of Cambridge. As far as the space at their disposal allowed, both have written excellently, each on his own lines. No Oxford man will read Mr. Lang's "Notes" without wishing that there were more of them, and no visitor to Cambridge can do better, unless he carries Mr. Clark's larger work with him, than trust to his handy volume for all matters bearing on the architectural history of the University and its colleges. To say that Mr. Lang shows that he has a firm grasp of the history of Oxford is, perhaps, to speak rather pedantically of a singularly graceful book, yet the very charm of his writing renders it especially incumbent on us to point out that he never allows his fancy to stray beyond a solid foundation of fact. How well he makes his facts serve him may be illustrated by so many passages that it is merely a matter of private taste which best deserves to be mentioned. Speaking for ourselves, we take special joy in his pictures of the town as it was eight hundred years and more ago, of Walter Stoke, an undergraduate of Catte Hall, mumming in the "High" some four centuries later, of the life of Oxford in Hearne's days, and of the typical college poet. Where so much is given it would be churlish to grumble at any omission, yet we were disappointed at not finding a description of how Giraldus read his Topographia Hibernica publicly at Oxford during three successive days, and on each day gave a great feast—"Sumptuosa quidem res et nobilis," as the Archdeacon modestly remarks—and at the inadequate notice accorded to the Lollard movement in the University. In "Notes" such as these, however, the author has a right to choose the subject which he thinks will best suit his purpose, and, as a whole, the series of pictures of the life of Oxford is wonderfully complete and instinct with life. Mr. Lang's affection for his University is exhibited not less in his criticisms on its present condition than in his handling of past events, and his papers contain some noteworthy remarks on tutorial drudgery and "dawdling erudition," on the outcry for the endowment of research, on the discontented and restless spirit of the place, its religious tendency, and the unhappy mania for running up new buildings which has done so much mischief during the last twenty years. Although Mr. Clark devotes the larger part of his space to the material growth and aspect of Cambridge—matters on which no one is better qualified to speak—he also tells us much that is interesting about the history of the University, its ancient customs, and its most famous members. Both volumes contain a large number of extremely delicate and beautiful illustrations by M. Brunet-Debaines and M. H. Toussaint, which alone would be sufficient to make them desirable possessions.

A WHITECHAPEL POET.*

E. J. COOPER, who is also called on his title-page by the cumbersome and surprising name of "Ægzaycæ," frankly and boldly avows himself to be "sensational." The word is used more often than not as a reproach; it is "Ægzaycæ's" boast. He warns off persons who "prefer their mental pabulum vapid, mawkish, insipid, tasteless, and invariably 'ending happily.'" He truly observes, or insinuates, that the adventures of real life sometimes end otherwise than happily, and while he "places the canons of Art above the follies of Fashion," his manly muse prefers to deal "not with the sunshine and zephyrs of life, but mainly with its lightnings and thunders; with some of the realities and profundities, not with the artificialities and superficialities, of human existence." The student of his works must also bear in mind that they are designed, among other things, for recitation, wherefore "all far-fetched phraseology has been carefully eschewed, its place [what is the place proper to far-fetched phraseology?] being occupied by unambiguous and unambitious narrative." Cultivated persons have often wondered whether there really exist pieces designed or used for recitation of such a nature as to have prompted the ingenious author of The Young Reciter's Manual to the composition of that delightful volume. A perusal of "Ægzaycæ's" work suggests that such pieces must have existed. It is impossible that if they had not, any one could have thought of offering reciters The Embalmed Heart. "Ægzaycæ" admits that there is a good deal of death in his poems, and justifies the circumstance by an elaborate argument to the effect that "a recountal of woe, rather than a description of happiness, possesses most interest for mankind."

As to the style of Mr. Cooper's poems, it is extremely like that of Mr. G. K. Sims, only more so. This will appear plainly enough from the few quotations which it will be desirable to give here in order to illustrate the general character of Mr. Cooper's more sensational recountals of woe, and more realistic representations of the lightnings and thunders of life. The first and principal poem is called, not only The Embalmed Heart, but also Endalee, because that is the name of the heroine. The reciter is supposed to be recounting a woe of his own. He was only a medical student, but he loved. "The world," he begins by saying, "one woman held for me, Of all its countless host—and she I worshipped as my queen." The grammar is probably an incident of unambiguous narrative. The one woman was Endalee, and "Too soon the stalking fate aneared That killed my every hope." The student had just been hugging her—

One last long kiss, one fond good-bye,
Ha! who are these approaching nigh?
Her parents 'tis I see.

* The Embalmed Heart; and other Sensational Poems. Suitable for Reading and Recitation. By E. J. Cooper (Ægzaycæ). London: Dean & Son.

And they kicked him out. They then proceeded to "prepare another marriage" with a promptitude worthy of Lord Bateman—

A penniless and aged earl
It was who'd wed my darling girl.

But Endalee sickened, and died on the day before that appointed for the marriage. The student had not been allowed to see her since his dismissal, and he was much disgusted:—

Delirium reigned where sense should be,
And my one shriek was "Endalee."
And "Endalee" again.

When she was dead, however, he was permitted to see the remains. What he saw and what he did the student describes with a realism which need not be followed here. It occurred to him that he had nothing of hers to keep. "Her heart," he remarked, "was mine in life." Taking advantage of his anatomical knowledge, he justifies the title of the poem (and of the volume) in a manner unparalleled except by "Jack the Ripper," and described in the baldest possible verse, and with literary graces like those which adorn the passages already extracted.

Another poem relates how a workman in a mill had a daughter called Laureen (which rhymes, by a happy chance, with been, green, and seen). She was taken ill when her father was at work. He wanted to go and nurse her:—

But ah! I dared not leave till I Had got permission first.
Back then I dashed inside the mill;
The thing abroad had newsed;
As soon as I my plea put forth
The Owner it refused!

She died, and her father observed, "Oh! why, Laureen—Laureen, oh! why Didst thou Death's potion quaff?" But the Owner refused him leave to attend the funeral on Monday, and said he could wait till Saturday. So he exhumed the unfortunate Laureen on Monday night, and kept the body till Saturday—with details—when he went to the Owner's house "To in his cellar wine to lay Of every clime and brand." Then he put the defunct in a wine-case and opened it before the Owner, who died of disgust on the following morning. The story of Irrosa ("Ægzaycæ's" taste in ladies' names is curious) is told by her husband, a reformed drunkard. He tried to murder her, but their dog flew at him and pinned him, so that "the blood that spurted from my throat commingled with her hair." The father of Aurea was also intemperate. Through his vice his daughter was starved, and instead of burying her with what money he had, he spent it in drink. But he had to eat something—and he did. Eloa is a comparatively clean and wholesome poem. "Her tears and her blood stained my coat." "I plunged in the knife yet again, With stabs that were savage and fierce; Her heart I endeavoured to pierce." However, "At last did her spirit take flight," and after that, so far as appears, he let her alone, so that this ballad may be thought trite by the sternest sect of "Ægzaycæ's" admirers.

THREE MEDICAL BOOKS.*

THE training of our girls has certainly improved since the day when it was considered unladylike for them to learn anything but the so-called accomplishments, and perhaps a slight smattering of housewifery. But if, as we think, the main object of true education should be to prepare the child mentally and physically to perform efficiently the work of her future life, then it must be admitted our present system is still very incomplete. We are not of opinion that woman's mission in life is "to suckle fools and chronicle small beer"; nevertheless, she ought to understand and be fitted to conscientiously perform the duties of wife and mother, which she is not unlikely to undertake. The importance to our race of the manner in which these duties are carried out can hardly be overrated. Yet the majority of girls are married without the vaguest notion of how to take care of the little ones who may probably be born. It has only recently been recognized that women are not by nature skilled sick nurses, but need to learn the art; and we are not without hope that in due time it may dawn upon the intelligence of the public that women are not intuitively acquainted with the conduct towards husband and children which will best promote the welfare of all. It may be objected to this that many women are never married; but even of these a large number are engaged in the management of children, and, if not, surely some slight knowledge of their own bodies would be no disadvantage to them. This book, by a mother, appears to us well calculated to supply this want as far as the management of children is concerned, until the time when a course of instruction in hygiene and elementary physiology shall form a part of the regular curriculum for boys and girls. When this desirable state of things shall have come about, this work will still form a useful textbook. A chapter on feeding the young at various ages and under different circumstances occupies more than one-third of the book, and we do not think that such an important matter can well receive too much attention. Those on repose, fresh air and exercise, sea-air, and water are excellent. Whilst fully appreciating the advantages of fresh air, the author is happily quite cognisant of the extreme danger of exposing children to draughts and sudden changes of temperature. The chapter on croup would have been better omitted. A note might have been inserted in that on home remedies to the effect that the domestic remedy for simple laryngeal spasm is a teaspoonful of ipecacuanha wine, followed by warm water; vomiting is thereby induced, and the spasm almost always relieved. Acute laryngitis and diphtheria (membranous croup) have always premonitory symptoms which ought to lead the parent to seek medical aid. Judicious advice is given as to the home treatment of some of the minor ailments of children. The unsparing condemnation of that dangerous class of secret nostrums, known as patent medicines, and encouraged by the stamp of a paternal Government, is a very beneficent feature in the chapter on home remedies. Much knowledge and good feeling are displayed in the final chapter on education.

The Story of the Bacteria is a charming little book, in which the structure, life, and habits of these microscopic vegetables are graphically depicted. Without any breach of scientific accuracy, Dr. Prudden has cleverly managed to make a somewhat gruesome subject not only unrepulsive, but positively attractive. In his capacity for casting a poetic halo around some of the sternest and hardest of nature's facts he is worthy to be classed with that master in this branch of literature—the late Charles Kingsley—and with his own countryman Oliver Wendell Holmes. He first lightly but intelligibly sketches the cellular constitution of the human body, and then tells us what bacteria are, what they do, and how they are studied. He goes on to show us how some of them are terrible, though invisible, foes to the life of man. In discussing this part of bacteriology we are disposed to think that he goes a little beyond what has been at present demonstrated in speaking of bacteria as the sole efficient cause of such diseases as tuberculosis, typhoid, cholera, &c.; but even if this be so, the precautions which he suggests for the prevention of these scourges of humanity are indisputably good. We are glad to see that he lays great stress on a too little recognized source of danger—namely, impure ice. The last paragraph of the book is so full of sound common sense that we may be excused for quoting it in its entirety:—"There are many of the uncanny and disagreeable things of life from which it were better that most of us turned away our eyes. But the avoidance of some of those forms of illness whose causes have been considered in this little book, is so closely dependent upon a general knowledge of their nature, that the offence of unpleasant revelations may, it is hoped, be forgiven by the reader in view of the ultimate and universal good which these lines have been penned to foster."

The pamphlet on Leprosy is, with slight additions, a reprint of one written by Mr. Macnamara, and published in Calcutta in 1866. It contains also a letter of great interest from Dr. Hillebrand, dated February 1866, describing the introduction of leprosy into the Sandwich Islands and its rapid spread among a population to whom it was previously unknown. Mr. Macnamara treats of this disease by answering elaborately half a dozen questions, which we will repeat, giving in each the gist of his answers in a few brief words.

I. What are the distinguishing characters of leprosy? Is it a specific disease?

The two forms of the disease are well described, and the opinions are expressed that there can be no doubt about its specific character, and that it may probably be dependent upon a bacillus.

II. Is leprosy common among the natives of the East Indies? Is it on the increase or not?

The former of these queries is answered unhesitatingly in the affirmative. In the case of the latter, it is said that the absence of statistical data renders it impossible to reply with certainty, but that it probably is so.

III. Is leprosy confined to any particular class of natives? Are any exempt from its influences?

The author has found it more common in certain classes of natives than others, but that none are exempt from it—indeed, that there is no race of which the members are so.

IV. What circumstances appear to induce leprosy? Is it hereditary, is it communicable?

Defective hygienic conditions favour the spread of this as of other diseases. The author believes it to be communicable, though probably only in the ulcerative stage, and feels no doubt of its being frequently hereditary.

V. Has any provision been made for the cure or treatment of leprosy patients in India?

None! We fear this answer would be almost as applicable now as twenty years ago.

VI. Is the disease curable? or are there any methods for curtailing the spread of leprosy?

In its developed stage it is quite incurable. Segregation is the only effective measure for checking the spread of the disease.

The republication of this pamphlet at the present time, when the subject of leprosy is exciting so much interest, is opportune, and the opinions expressed in it, although formed twenty years ago, closely correspond with those held by "those who know" in 1889.

M. FEBVRE'S REMINISCENCES.*

IN publishing his Au bord de la Scène M. Febvre complies with the unwritten law which provides that every sociétaire of the Comédie-Française in the present day shall have some claim, literary or artistic, to consideration apart from his membership of that august body. His elastic title allows him to include in this his latest contribution to literature sketches and anecdotes but slightly connected with histrionic experience, and to lug in the records of gratifying acts of recognition or homage on the part of dignitaries, with which the budget of a successful artist is ordinarily well stocked. It is thus, while he has the honour to "cheminer en compagnie du comte de N—, alors ambassadeur en France, bien connu par la finesse de son esprit et la correction de ses manières," that the opportunity presents itself for recalling in "La carte à payer" the period of trial and privation which the career of most actors supplies. When, also, a "histoire vraie," and, we may add, navrante—"Les sabots de la vieille," the scene of which is laid in a "coin très pittoresque entre Perros-Guirec et Trégastel," "en Bretagne"—has to be told, it is sufficiently linked to M. Febvre's stage career by the fact that it is there he has come to pass "son congé." Not without interest or value are these portions of the volume, though French literature and journalism overflow with similar studies and revelations. Now and then, indeed, we get a thought or an epigram worthy of preservation. It is pleasant to find a piece of just criticism assigned to an English nobleman, Lord Granville, with whom during the Commune M. Febvre was asked to dine. In some preliminary lines M. Febvre has been bewailing the manner in which modern costume abolishes class distinctions, with the result that "la suprême élégance se résumant dans un même et fraternel habit noir, les grandes manières n'étant plus les mêmes sous ce vêtement étrié, l'aisance française a cédé la place à la raideur britannique; et la preuve est que l'on ne dit plus d'un monsieur qui a de bonnes manières: 'Il est distingué,' mais bien, 'Il est correct.'" A propos to these reflections M. Febvre tells how, vaunting to Lord Granville, whom he calls "le gentilhomme le plus parisien du Royaume-Uni," the distinction of manners of Bressant, the following dialogue took place:—"Oh! Bressant n'est pas distingué, me dit-il.—Vous trouvez, milord?—Oh! non. Lafont est distingué, Bressant est comme il faut." On which he observes, "Ceux qui se souviennent de Lafont et de sa haute allure dans le prince de Rabagas apprécieront la finesse de cette nuance."

It is, however, in his artistic recollections and experiences that M. Febvre is most amusing. Possessor of a vein of quiet humour, he leaves the reader occasionally in doubt as to whether he is serious or ironical. In the case of the actors with whom he deals, it is safer to assume that all is meant. In "Le costume au théâtre," which is dedicated to M. Francisque Sarcey, and from which the previous dialogue is taken, M. Febvre is at his best. Little information upon the history of costume is attempted. A light, however, is cast upon the influence of costume upon the artist, a subject at once fresher and more interesting. Talma thus, after donning in his dressing-room the costume of Manilius, and scrutinizing carefully the folds of his toga, said to one of his sons, from whom M. Febvre obtained the anecdote, "Là! Voici la moitié de mon rôle jouée." This story is in keeping with the credit attached by Talma, in his Souvenirs, to the part taken by David in the reformation established in the adjustment of theatrical costumes—a part, however, in which, it is but just to say, he had been to some extent anticipated by his master Vien, and also by Gabriel-François Doyen. A marvellous but easily credible piece of artistic conscientiousness is narrated on equally good authority of Brunet, an admirable comedian who was at school with Talma, and is said to have created six hundred comic parts. In La Maison en Loterie Brunet enacted a proprietor who had only to speak from the other side of a wall, and consequently was unseen by the public. Nightly, in order to play this rôle, he got himself up conscientiously, with wig, spectacles, and all similar accessories. Potier, from whose son M. Febvre obtains the anecdote, pointed out that this costume, the accuracy of which the public were in no position to test, was superfluous and useless. "Mais si! mais si! c'est utile," lui répondit Brunet; "avec le costume de ce propriétaire, avec sa perruque, ses lunettes, je prends son allure . . . et avec son allure, sa voix! . . . Et puis, si le mur tombait!" The first part of the defence is entitled to respect as well as credit; the concluding supposition seems to link the story with folklore. Even more remarkable is an anecdote which M. Febvre narrates as a personal experience of Mélingue, with whom, under the direction of Marc Fournier, he was playing at the Porte-Saint-Martin in the Schamyl of Paul Meurice. Mélingue, though the performance did not begin until half-past seven, had the habit of arriving at the theatre at four. Passing before the dressing-room M. Febvre saw Mélingue busy. He entered, and stood stupefied. What he saw M. Febvre must relate:—"Il se rasait les jambes comme on se rase la barbe, sous le prétexte que les Orientaux ont l'habitude de s'épiler. Après avoir peint ses jambes, comme on se peint le visage, il chaussait ses babouches, et, comme on le peut penser, jamais un maillot n'eût donné un résultat semblable à celui qu'il obtenait grâce à ce sacrifice capillaire." This anecdote may rank with one current in England; but, unfortunately for the credit of English art, told concerning an amateur and not a "professional," that when he played Othello he always blackened himself all over.

For this thoroughness on matters of costume M. Febvre has an unconcealed admiration; and he mentions how on a revival of Lucrèce Borgia at the Porte-Saint-Martin Mélingue, as Alphonse d'Este, before he had spoken a word, was, for his costume only, applauded "à trois reprises successives." A somewhat dangerous experiment was tried by Mathis in Denner's Bohémiens de Paris; when playing a man who sought in the madness produced by brandy oblivion of his misfortunes, he fixed on his face tears composed of gum. Of Mme. Marie Laurent in La Voleuse d'Enfants, of Lesueur of the Gymnase, and of other artists, he speaks as masters of "la loque pittoresque." In the rôle of Saltabadil, in Le Roi s'amuse, he claims himself to have succeeded, eliciting from M. Perrin, director of the Comédie-Française, the compliment, "Plus je vous regarde, et plus il me semble que j'ai des envies folles de me gratter—ce n'est pas un costume, c'est une démangeaison!" Not always was he so successful. Having to play the rôle of Le Duc de Nemours in Louis XI et les grands vassaux of Victor Séjour, he hunted out an old plate on which the Duc was shown with an immense two-handed sword without a sheath, attached on the back of the wearer by a double chain which was crossed over the breast. Proud of his discovery, he entered thus equipped, to be greeted by M. Sarcey with a laughing and deadly "Tiens! un rognon brochette!" An even worse adventure befel Adolphe Berton, who, playing Charles VII., borrowed from the Musée d'Artillerie a véritable casque of the period. Whether through rust or the existence of some unknown spring, the visor fell at a critical moment, and could not be lifted, and the remainder of the play had to be presented with the actor still imprisoned.

It is somewhat surprising to hear M. Febvre speak of having played at half-past five o'clock and finished while it was still daylight a spectacle composed of Le Chien de Montargis and Le Sonneur de Saint-Paul. He laments the publicity which "le reportage" has given to the life of the comedian, and the consequent loss by the public of the sentiment of curiosity as to his personality outside the theatre, but consoles himself with the aphorism or the paradox, "Nous avons gagné en considération ce que nous avons perdu en originalité." A sign of the change that has come over the conditions of the stage is the disappearance of camaraderie among actors who no longer "se sentent les coudes." He regrets the suppers which used to follow a first representation, either "chez Truchot, au coin de la rue de Lancry," or "chez Bertrand, un petit marchand de vins restaurateur," whose modest shop has disappeared, and the joyous anecdotes and the gay projects there formed. "Tout était modeste à cette époque. La mise en scène, cette pourvoyeuse de la faillite, n'avait pas encore fait ses ravages." In the revival of Henri III et sa Cour at the Gaité, Hostein, the director, declared he was about to ruin himself. For the decorations and dresses, including the costumes of Frédérick Lemaitre in the Duc de Guise, Laferrière in Saint-Mégrin, and Mme. Naptal-Arnaut in the Duchess, he should spend five to six thousand francs. With some self-humiliation M. Febvre confesses that, at the subsequent revival of the piece during the present year at the Théâtre Français, his own costume and arms as the Duc de Guise cost about the same as the entire previous performance. A propos to the Gaité revival, the difficulty is mentioned of the manager with three actors, each having the right to be "en vedette"—that is, to have his name preceding that of his fellows. In his embarrassment he appealed to Frédérick, who said "Mettez-les tous en vedette . . . et moi, mettez-moi dans le tas, avec les autres. . . . On me trouvera le soir." All too few are the souvenirs of Frédérick. In the afore-mentioned rôle of Guise, however, M. Febvre has seen him, when suffering from his feet, come on the stage in the fourth act, wearing "chaussons de Strasbourg," and gives the assurance that, on seeing and hearing him, little attention was paid to the anachronism.

M. Febvre's recollections generally are few and appetizing. They are ushered into the world, after a custom much in vogue of late, and not widely dissimilar from the practice of prefixing to a work commendatory verses in the days of Shakspeare, by a preface from the pen of M. Jules Claretie. The point in this is the prediction addressed to the author, "Votre livre réussira comme un de vos rôles," which is imitated from a madrigal of Villemain, celebrated in the Institut. In receiving M. Scribe, Villemain began:—"Monsieur, votre discours a réussi comme une de vos pièces."

ENGLAND AND SOUTH AFRICA.*

MR. GIBBS has attempted a difficult task. In a volume of a hundred and thirty-two pages he has dealt more or less with all the questions that have arisen in the past, or now confront us in Africa from Zanzibar to the Cape. Not content with this, he has thrown in the unconsidered trifle of a chapter on Madagascar. It is obvious that there are two ways of dealing with so vast a subject, or rather group of subjects; either it should be treated exhaustively, in which case the results would be imposing—indeed, so imposing, that few would study them—or the really vital questions should be brilliantly and tersely summed up, all that is material should be thrown prominently forward, and repetition sternly avoided. Mr. Gibbs seems to have desired to combine both methods, and we cannot say that he has succeeded. Nor does he appear to have the first requisite for such a task, personal knowledge of the country of which he treats, for in his dedication he expressly states that he does not pretend to have written from materials collected by his own travel and observation, and, indeed, we should have gathered as much from his book. To take a single instance of his method, the twenty pages devoted to the history of the Transvaal are a model of confusion, for he ends the consideration of his subject where he ought to begin it, by discussing the Sand River Convention of 1852. They are also not void of inaccuracies. Thus on p. 26 we read that the forces of President Burgess (qy. Burgers) were defeated, "that under these circumstances Great Britain interfered, and Sir Garnet Wolseley subdued Secocoeni. Peace was concluded on February 5, 1877." Now, as a matter of fact, Sir Garnet Wolseley did not subdue Secocoeni till after the Zulu War, or some three years later. Again, on p. 27, we read:—"It is sufficient to say that towards the end of October, 1878, the Zulus attacked Colonel Griffiths, the Resident in the Transvaal, with overwhelming forces, and compelled him to retire; that in January, 1879, we were defeated with heavy loss at Rorke's Drift," &c. Of the first of these incidents, the attack on Colonel Griffiths, we confess we have no recollection, but perhaps our memory is at fault here. What, however, is meant by "the Resident in the Transvaal"? A Resident was, indeed, appointed after the retrocession of the country to the Boers in August 1881; but at the date of which Mr. Gibbs writes the Government was administered by Sir Theophilus Shepstone. Also, we always thought that it was not at Rorke's Drift that we met with defeat, but at Isandhlwana. Hitherto we had associated Rorke's Drift with a certain gallant defence, in which biscuit-boxes and bayonets played a conspicuous part. Before a writer ventures on the historical treatment of a most intricate subject, it is surely desirable that he should make himself a thorough master of his facts. This precaution Mr. Gibbs appears to have neglected, and by so doing he has thrown away a considerable opportunity, for a clear, accurate, and forcible book on South African matters would have been welcome at this time. We regret the obligation that is on us to speak thus of Mr. Gibbs's work, for his aim is a good one, and his heart in the right place. He clearly sees the evils that have been brought upon South Africa by the folly of successive Governments, and he does not overstate the case when he writes that the past history of South Africa is a "melancholy record of imbecility, vacillation, cowardice, and parsimony."

Mr. Gibbs, in his chapter headed "The Latest News," deals at some length with the Swaziland question. He points out the great danger in which England stands of losing that country, and further that all the efforts made by persons interested in preventing this catastrophe have not succeeded in wringing from Her Majesty's Government any downright expression of their intentions on the subject. All that Lord Knutsford will commit himself to is an assertion "that Sir Francis de Winton's mission to Swaziland is one of inquiry, with a view to enabling Her Majesty's Government to decide what course it is most desirable to take in regard to that country, in the interest of both natives and white settlers, and of South Africa generally." This is all very well; but it may have been noticed by students of South African history, that when the Colonial Office despatches a representative on a mission of "inquiry," it has very generally given that representative a strong hint as to what kind of report will be most acceptable to it. There is little doubt that the Colonial Office recently entertained, and in all probability still entertains, a project of surrendering Swaziland to the Boers, in the hope of reducing its correspondence and ridding itself of responsibility, and that nothing short of strong pressure from outside opinion will prevent it from following its traditional policy of shame and disaster in this instance also. But will that pressure be forthcoming? Mr. Gibbs also prints in his "Conclusion" certain extracts from the farewell speech of Sir Hercules Robinson to the people of the Cape Colony, of which the telegraphic summary created some excitement in this country. He points out, with force, that a school of public servants has grown up who seem to find their duty in working injury to the country which they serve, instancing as examples Mr. Gladstone in the Ionian Isles, Sir John Pope Hennessy in Mauritius, the Marquess of Ripon in India, and Earl Spencer in Ireland. "But perhaps," he adds, "Sir Hercules Robinson is the most conspicuous, as he is the latest, specimen of the faithless servant. Sent out eight years ago, not only as Governor of the Cape, but as High Commissioner of Her Majesty's possessions in South Africa, he makes a farewell speech to the Cape colonists, in which he practically advises them to aim at becoming a republic, and assuming the control of South and Central Africa. Sir Hercules does not, in so many words, advocate slavery; but, if we read between the lines, we may see that he has become a convert to the Boer doctrine of enforced labour." Then follow extracts from the famous "speech." We confess, if they are faithfully reported, that they strike us as odd utterances to have come from the lips of a servant of Her Majesty. But then we live in a remarkable age, in which servants of Her Majesty often take strange views of their duty to their Queen and country.

WATSON'S GUSTAVUS VASA.*

SWEDISH history seems to be attracting a good deal of interest in England at present. We have but just welcomed Mr. Bain's remarkable volume when a new writer, Mr. Watson, comes forward with a careful and original study of the great Revolution under Gustavus Vasa. From a variety of small indications we gather the impression that Mr. Watson is an American; but his book is no warming up of cold meats. He has mastered one of the most crabbed and thankless of dialects, the Swedish vernacular of the early part of the sixteenth century, and at Stockholm and at Upsala he has personally examined and deciphered the masses of MSS., particularly those in the Palmskiöld collection, which bear most directly upon the time of Gustavus. The authorities of the Royal Archives are gradually printing these uncouth heaps of documentary evidence; but the bulk still remains inedited, and Mr. Watson quotes on almost every page from papers which it must have cost him a great deal of labour to read. We are bound to suppose, of course, that he has read correctly; and he is careful to collate his own view of the text with those of the first Swedish authorities, such as Fryxell, Svedelius, and Bishop Anjou. In England the romantic story of Gustavus has been a familiar commonplace of history; but very little or nothing of an exact nature has been published on this subject. In 1761 Henry Augustus Raymond, writing under the pseudonym of Sarah Scott, printed a Life of Gustavus Vasa, which had some pretensions. An anonymous biography, of no authority, appeared in 1852. With these exceptions, we know of no English work which has attempted to cover the ground so minutely surveyed by Mr. Watson.

The period of Swedish history which immediately preceded the Revolution of 1521 is exceedingly obscure, chaotic, and unattractive. The record of anarchy is never inspiring reading, and the tyranny of Denmark produced, in its early phases, but one man, Sten Sture, on whose memory the mind rests with sympathy and respect. Mr. Watson, in face of the hopeless confusion of the early authorities, decides that Gustavus Vasa must have been born neither in 1487, nor in 1495, nor in 1490, but on the 12th of May, 1496. At that time the Swedish nation, gradually gathering force and patriotism, had been for forty years engaged in persistently rebelling with modified success against the hateful Danish yoke, and for the last thirteen years, since the miserable diet of Kalmar, the struggle had ceased and the King of Denmark seemed firmly seated again in Sweden. Sture, as Regent, alone held out, and, in the autumn of the very year that saw the birth of Gustavus, that noble-minded patriot, rather than bend to the King of Denmark, retired to the recesses of the Dales. Nothing could be more thorny than the maze of intrigues and guerilla warfare which occupied the next twenty years, a maze through which the reader must permit Mr. Watson to be his careful and intelligent guide. At this point, as an example of Mr. Watson's style, we may give a portion of the passage in which he has reconstructed, mainly from the Historia de Gentibus Septentrionalibus of Olaus Magni, published at Rome in 1555, a picture of Stockholm at the beginning of the sixteenth century:—

The main isle, on which "the city," so called, was built, stretched scarce a quarter of a mile from east to west, and but little more from north to south. . . . Through the centre of the main isle ran a huge backbone of rock. . . . The summit of this ridge was crowned by the royal citadel, a massive edifice of stone, the northern wall of which ran close along the shore, so that the soldier on patrol could hear the ripple of the water on the rocks below. From either side of the citadel the town walls ran south at a distance of perhaps a hundred feet from the shore, meeting at a point about the same distance from the southern channel. Within the triangle thus formed, not over twenty-five acres all told, lived and moved five thousand human beings. The streets, it need scarcely be said, were narrow, dark, and damp. The houses were lofty, generally with high pitch-roofs, to prevent the snow from gathering on them. The doors and windows were high, but narrow, to keep out the cold, and were built in the sides of the house, not in front owing to the darkness and narrowness of the streets. To economize space, most of the houses were built in blocks of five or six, wholly separated from their neighbours, and forming a sort of castle by themselves. The only church inside the walls was the so-called Great Church on the summit of the hill. . . . Two squares, the largest not more than eighty yards in length, served at once as the market, the promenade, and the place of execution for the town. . . . All around the main island, some fifty feet from the shore, ran a long bridge on piles, built as a safeguard against hostile ships.

Such was the Stockholm, with its curious guilds, into whose life Gustavus passed in the year 1514. He arrived in it during a brief lull in the distressing storm in that century almost incessantly blowing upon the unhappy coast of Sweden. It was in the course of the same year that to the feeble Hans succeeded Christiern II. of Denmark, a figure base enough and sanguinary enough to adorn the fabulous annals of some African dynasty. The reign of this monster marked the lowest point in the miserable history of Swedish oppression, and it was his incredible treachery and cruelty which forced the timid peasantry to respond to the final appeal of Gustavus.

The contest between Sture, as Regent, and the truculent young Archbishop of Upsala, Gustaf Trolle, occupies a large portion of Mr. Watson's earlier chapters, and appeals rather to the curious than to the general reader. It is necessary to the thread of his discourse, since the fact that the cause of Trolle was taken up by Christiern II. prepared the way for the final catastrophe. When, in September 1518, the King of Denmark, driven from the walls of Stockholm, formed the devilish project of demanding six noble Swedes as hostages, and then of bolting with them, Gustavus Vasa was one of those who were thus captured and carried off by the Danish fleet in defiance of the elements of international law. He was taken to Kalö Castle, a fortress on a promontory of Jutland, where he had to listen, as Svart tells us in his naive old chronicle, to nothing but tales of the greatness of King Christiern, and of the armaments he was fitting out to punish the patriots of Sweden. He was imprisoned in this melancholy castle for a year; and there occurred that romantic escape, in the garb of a drover, and that no less romantic flight to Lübeck, and, on the 31st of May, 1520, to Kalmar, which have inspired so many poets and painters. He had arrived in Sweden at a critical moment. The heroic Sture had just fallen, fighting for the liberty of his country in the forests of Västergötland, and Sweden was without a leader. The patriot army was on the very verge of ruin, and the siege of the Regent's widow, the noble Christina, in her little city of Stockholm, had begun four days before her nephew, Gustavus Vasa, landed. Through that summer of 1520, the latter was hiding as near Stockholm as the presence of the Danish cavalry would let him come, until in November news reached him of that blood-bath in the Citadel of Stockholm, in which four-fifths of the nobility of Sweden fell at one stroke to satisfy the malignity of Christiern II. It was flying from one covert to another through Dalarne, and stung by the knowledge that his own father had fallen among the rest, that Gustavus Vasa began to address the villagers, and stir them against the Danish monster. According to contemporary tradition, it was at the hamlet of Mora, on Lake Siljan, a spot now sacred to the Swedish pilgrim, and upon Christmas morning, that Gustavus uttered the first of his patriotic appeals to his downtrodden countrymen. Early in 1521 he had roused the province of Dalarne; doubting the power of his own words, he was making his way to the frontier of Norway, when a deputation of the villagers of Mora pursued, and brought him back. He found himself at the head of a little army of highlanders, and the Swedish Revolution had begun. Our chief authority for these picturesque incidents is Gustaf I.'s Krönika, written by Peder Svart, who pronounced the funeral oration over the body of Gustavus on the 21st of December, 1560, and who had been one of his most intimate counsellors.

It is a point of considerable merit in Mr. Watson's work that, without any straining of facts, he makes us feel that the Swedish Revolution was the work of his hero, and of his personal character alone. His chronicle of the movement melts into a history of the man, and if ever it was true that a nation owed its independence, its national life, to a single person, that was true in the case of Sweden and her Vasa king. If Gustavus had died in one of the uncertain skirmishes of his first campaign, it is hardly possible to see who, after the massacre of the nobles had lopped off all the heads of the leading families, could have taken the position of a commander. Sweden must have sunk into such a mere province and dependency of Denmark as Norway became. When, on the 6th of June, 1523, Gustavus was made king by acclamation at the Diet of Strengnäs, he was not merely the best, but he was the only practicable, candidate for the crown; and whatever the faults of Gustavus may have been, it remains a fact that when, thirty-seven years later, he laid down his laurels in the grave, he left what he had found a tormented appanage of the Danish throne, a power among the monarchies of Europe. As Mr. Watson says, with complete truth, "In all history there is no more striking example of the far-reaching influence which individual characters sometimes exert upon a nation's growth."

The great War of Independence was no sooner brought to a close by the coronation of Gustavus than the transformation of religious belief which culminated in the Reformation began to make itself felt. The Popes had, with the possible exception of Adrian VI., no sympathy with the North and no knowledge of its requirements. In their struggle for independence, the Swedes had found Rome the supporter of their tyrants, and their own Archbishop of Upsala the most insidious of their enemies. The wealth and luxury of the clergy, particularly within the six cathedral chapters, contrasted with the misery of the common people, and the most superstitious could not but begin to observe it. The piracies of the Danes might reduce the inhabitants of Östergötland to gnaw the bark off the trees and grind nuts and acorns for bread, but it did not lessen the splendour of the services in the cathedral of Linköping. It was impossible but that wealth so pompously displayed and so selfishly hoarded should excite the cupidity alike of people and of sovereign. Accordingly we find Gustavus gaining popularity while he fills his exhausted treasury by forcing the indignant bishops to disgorge their marks and guilders. Yet, curiously enough, the actual blow was dealt from within the Swedish Church itself. The Luther of Swedish reformation was Olaus Petri, a blacksmith's son, who, from his post as head of the chapter school in Strengnäs, obtained a great ascendancy over the bishop of that diocese, Laurentius Andreae, and persuaded him to wink at the preaching of heresy under the very towers of his cathedral. Urged by Petri, Andreae proposed to the Vadstena Chapter, as early as February 1524, that the writings of Luther should no longer be excluded, but subjected to fair critical examination in comparison with the Scriptures. Four months later Petri and Andreae had been advanced to higher ecclesiastical posts in Stockholm and Upsala, and the King had openly espoused the cause of the Reformation. In February, 1525, Olaus Petri was publicly married in Stockholm, and it was too late for any step backward to be taken.

We must not continue our survey of Mr. Watson's volume any further. The period with which it deals is not one of great interest to the average English reader, and may be said to appeal to comparatively few. But those who are attracted to it will be pleased by the modesty and thoroughness of the author, by his simple enthusiasm, and by the care he has taken to sacrifice nothing to a clear and honest presentment of the facts.

LIFE AND SPORT IN SOUTHERN INDIA.*

COLONEL DRURY, in his short preface, says that he may be thought presumptuous for writing about "India" when he is familiar only with a limited area, and that in the South. It is for this very reason that his production possesses a certain value. He does not write about the India of hot winds, celebrated battle-fields, and Imperial ruins. He describes a tract of country comparatively little known, and certainly not tempting to the cold-weather tourist and sportsman. He has something to say about the bison and the elephant, hot rides in the day across dusty plains, and cold bivouacs in tents in the Nelliampati Hills, where the sleepless coolies shivered and half the goats and all the kids died in one night. He writes in a straightforward and simple style; and though he is rather given to display familiar Latin quotations, the habit may be pardoned in one who bears a name associated with the classics. We hear very little about long lines of trained elephants, and the results of some of his expeditions were certainly not large bags. The scene of his adventures was not favourable to slaughter. When he came up with a herd of bison, after crawling on his hands and knees through wild cane and thick jungle, he lodged a bullet in an animal, which stunned and did not kill. He wounded an elephant of such portentous size that the beast had been taken by him for a rock: dura silex, aut stet Marpesia cautes, Colonel Drury might have added. The animal was found dead by the natives ten weeks afterwards, and we are not surprised to learn that they had appropriated the tusks. Game of various kinds, if ever plentiful, was not easy to find in the jungle; and the author expressly says that in a land where game laws are unknown and certificates have not been invented, in a ride of eight and a walk of three miles, occupying an hour and a half, he only met with four elk, eight or nine snipe, two hares, and five jungle fowl. We apprehend that by elk the author means the Sambur deer. Captain Baldwin in his accurate work on the Large and Small Game of Bengal especially tells us that sportsmen in Ceylon give the name of elk to the Sambur, and assures us that the real elk is only to be met with in Sweden, Siberia, and North America. It is known to naturalists as the cervus alces. Colonel Drury greatly objects to the system by which the natives entrap wild elephants in Southern India. They are driven by an army of beaters into a stockade, which a certain amount of skill and labour, aided by the nature of the ground, has converted into a prison, out of which the enraged animals cannot break. Pits are dug and are covered with layers of light bamboos and leaves, and the unfortunate elephant that falls into one of them, twenty feet deep, is either maimed or rendered useless, or is only got out when within a few inches of death by starvation. There is naturally great difficulty in freeing the captive if he survives his first tumble. Branches and leaves and rubbish are shot into the pit, so as to lift the elephant to a point where his legs and neck can be secured. He is then harnessed to two or three tame elephants, usually females, and hauled up by main force. This cruel and characteristic practice used to be followed in the jungles of Assam, but, if we recollect right, it was most properly prohibited by an unsympathizing and despotic Government. Colonel Drury, we may say, was no fair-weather sportsman who would not move without an army of coolies, a double set of tents with loads of upholstery, and an ample supply of provisions cased in tin. He had rather a contempt for the bullock-cart, which is the habitual mode of conveyance in many parts of Bombay and Madras; when arched over with matting and drawn by fine bullocks it is not so uncomfortable a vehicle, and is often used by English ladies and their children in preference to a palanquin. He rode boldly in the heat and glare of the day, and could be content at the dreariest of Dawk Bungalows with the simplest and hardest fare. On one occasion a native proprietor allowed him to take up his quarters in a granary with a verandah; and, though there was just room enough for the Colonel to stow away his cot and arrange his table, he thought this life perfectly charming, and could have stayed there many days had it not been for the illness and death of a friend.

But the author's experiences were not confined to the jungle. He held the office of Assistant to the Resident in Travancore and Cochin; and in this capacity he visited places and was admitted to exhibitions marked by something beyond the invariable attar and pawn. He sailed for a day and a night along that extraordinary backwater which is protected from the violence of the Indian Ocean, and yet in some places is so wide as to get up a mimic sea of its own. With a few artificial cuttings, this natural waterway now extends one hundred and seventy-five miles from Trevandrum, the capital of the native State of Travancore, to British territory. On one tour with the Resident—who, it may be conceived, marched with a guard of Sepoys and an enormous retinue of servants, and not with the modest equipment of a sportsman—Colonel Drury was enabled to make an excursion to Cape Comorin. His description of this spot, seldom visited by Englishmen, is a good specimen of the author's powers of observation and style:—

From the hot, scorching plains, to come in a morning's ride before breakfast, to a fine, large house on the sea-coast was inexpressibly delightful. We are surrounded on three sides by the ocean, and can see the sun rise and set beyond the waves. . . . A more retired spot in India could scarcely be selected than this for those who are fond of a quiet life; I will not say a solitary one, for the sea, the restless, ever-changing sea, is a companion one never tires of.

He goes on to describe the beach, covered with fossil limestone; some pieces of broken quartz, with the size and appearance of grains of rice, concerning which there is, of course, a legend about a maiden and a faithless lover, and a curse pronounced by the lady; the scanty vegetation, as if nature at this point had exhausted her productive powers; the dreary landscape and the background of mountains, 5,000 feet in height, ending in a black, precipitous rock about fifteen miles from the sea.

About Cochin and the white Jews the author has something to say. These curious people, remarkably fair, whose women display considerable beauty with light ringlets and blue eyes, are fast diminishing by emigration and death. If not prevented by want of means, they all wish to get back to Jerusalem. The Black Jews are much more numerous. The term Topass caused the author considerable perplexity. It is hinted that the word may be another form of Dubash, an interpreter, or one who knows dui (two) Bhasha (languages). But Colonel Yule is much more likely to have hit on the correct derivation. It is a corruption of the Turkish topchi, a gunner or artilleryman, or it comes from topiwala, one who wears a hat. Now, seeing that any European wearing a hat is often designated by the natives as topiwala, it seems more probable that the dark-skinned, half-caste claimants of Portuguese descent were called Topasses because they were formerly employed as gunners. In Fryer's Index Topasses are specially said to be musketeers or firemen.

Of the Raja of Travancore and his enlightened Minister, Sir Madhava Rao, Colonel Drury speaks in terms of well-deserved praise. The last Raja of Tanjore, who died in 1855, was more like the typical Raja. He possessed, it is true, a large and valuable library, with some curious manuscripts, which have been catalogued by the late Dr. Burnell, of the Madras Civil Service. But he was fond of exhibitions and combats, which are poor indications of civilization and progress. There were combats of buffaloes kept in a half wild state, as well as of rams and antelopes. It is noteworthy to be told on the author's authority, which we do not doubt, that in a fight between a wild boar and a goat the latter was the conqueror nine times out of ten. It is right to state that the forehead of the goat was armed with a long and sharp knife to put it on an equality with the boar's tusks. Yet if the boar could once have got within the knife's point, like a swordsman within the lance, and have delivered his well-known cut between the fore and the hind legs of his antagonist, there can be little doubt that the goat would have been disembowelled. The combat of animals was, in the author's view, less barbarous than a boxing-match between two pugilists. They are called "Jetties," and the naked fist is armed with a small strip of hide or bamboo, furnished with four sharp edges. The fight, which is graphically described in terms which we do not care to reproduce, often ends in the death of one or other of the combatants. A gladiatorial exhibition could scarcely have been more disgraceful and repulsive, and it is small consolation to learn that the family of a deceased pugilist is usually pensioned by the Raja. Many feats of dexterity on the part of Indian jugglers have often been witnessed and well described, but we do not recollect to have heard before of the feat related in the following description. "A man came on the stage armed from head to foot with keen-edged knives of various shapes and sizes." There were half a dozen on his arms, calves, and feet. Yet he managed for nearly one hour to dance, skip, and twist his arms and legs right, left, forwards, and backwards, without showing the least graze or abrasure on his skin. Colonel Drury must have been glad when the juggler was allowed to salaam to the Raja and withdraw. This feat was almost surpassed by that of a boy who, after performing divers evolutions and contortions, actually sat on his own head.

Among other curious physical objects in Southern India is a sort of natural breakwater formed opposite one of the towns in the Travancore State, known as Allepey or Alleppi. The town is situated on land between the open sea and the backwater already alluded to. But the open roadstead is protected from the south-west monsoon by a bank of mud of about three miles in length. It is not always stationary, as it has shifted its position in the last fifty years. There is no river in the neighbourhood, to create the bar so familiar to navigators of other streams discharging themselves into the Bay of Bengal or the Indian Ocean. In explanation it is suggested that the material of the mud-bank comes from the backwater through some mysterious and subterranean channel. It requires no engineering knowledge to see that such a mudbank could not have been thrown up by the mere action of the waves on the ocean-bed or shore; for in that case, it must have taken the shape of an accretion to the land, and not of a breakwater at a distance sufficient to form a harbour. But India has always been a land in which nature's operations—landslips, accretions and diluvions, storms and hurricanes—are effected on a gigantic and bewildering scale. Probably in no part of India are the barriers of caste more rigid than in the South. Some low caste Caanikars, whom we cannot find distinctly mentioned in the Imperial Gazetteer, are not allowed to come within twenty paces, not to say of a Brahman or Kshatriya, but of an ordinary shopkeeper. If one of these miserable outcasts wants to buy a little rice, he puts his small coin in front of the shop, and retires. The shopkeeper takes his money and leaves an equivalent in rice. Ollares and Naiaddys are even lower in the scale. They wear little or no clothing, and live on roots, herbs, and the flesh of wild beasts. They are obviously aborigines who have adopted some of the forms of Hindu society. Brahmans in Southern India exact or are accustomed to a show of respect which certainly would not be conceded to them in Upper or Central India. In Colonel Drury's time ordinary Hindus of the lower castes, and not mere jungle people, scattered right and left along the road when they saw a Brahman approaching. This entirely bears out the accounts of missionaries to those parts as to the unapproachable sanctity of the highest caste. The ceremony of weighing a Raja or other important personage against so many gold mohurs is not peculiar, as imagined by Colonel Drury, to Travancore. It is not unusual in Upper India and Lower Bengal, and great is the rejoicing of the attendants and retainers if the great man takes an extra bag or two to make the scales equal. Altogether there is more to be gleaned from this modest volume than from more imposing and bulky works. The resources of India, like those of civilization, are by no means exhausted for the resident, official and unofficial, who can use his wits and write with discretion about what he really knows.

* Reminiscences of Life and Sport in Southern India. By Colonel Heber Drury, late Madras Staff Corps and Assistant Resident in Travancore and Cochin. Author of "The Useful Plants of India," "Handbook of the Indian Flora," &c. &c. London: W. H. Allen & Co.

MISS DUNLOP'S ANENT OLD EDINBURGH.*

THOUGH the late Miss Alison Hay Dunlop's little book, Anent Old Edinburgh, is very interesting in itself, it is less interesting than the brief sketch of her life. Hers was an admirable example of Scotch character at its best, with its probity, vigour, industry, love of the traditional past, and unfaltering courage in the trials of life. She was born in Stockbridge, a suburb of Edinburgh, and a place which can only seem agreeable to people who have known it intimately and long. The foul Water of Leith, which was once so beautiful and full of trout, flows through it with a current like the bottle-ends of stale beer. The bridge itself is no marvel of architecture, and the best thing to be said for the suburb is that you can get out of it easily, in the course of a five minutes' walk, into the country beyond the Grange cricket-ground, and the fields which were so pretty before the Fettes College people destroyed the leafy lanes and laid down their preposterously pretentious roads. Though born in Stockbridge, a Sparta which she endeavoured to adorn, Miss Dunlop came of a family in the hill country of Selkirkshire, and her mother's house, of Huguenot extraction, had long been yeomen, near Melrose. Her holidays were passed at Kaeside, on the Abbotsford property; Scott used to sign himself "Abbotsford and Kaeside." During a long illness here as a child she read Buchan's Domestic Medicine, and was led to infer that she was "a hail infirmity" of maladies. To divert her mind she turned to Border antiquities, and is said to have known several ballads which never appeared in print. She did not write them out, and it is rather difficult to believe that any real unpublished ballads—not mere variants—came to her after escaping Kirkpatrick Sharpe, Maidment, Scott, and so many other famous collectors. At school she was so clever and ambitious that she got a double remove and kept at the head of her new class among her seniors. Many years of her life were now devoted to historical and literary study, and she also did some work as a visiting governess by way of learning to teach, in case a profession of some sort should become needful. She attended Professor Masson's lectures to women on English literature and won the first prize among the learned ladies. "She ever afterwards entertained the deepest admiration and regard for the Professor." She had been engaged for some years to a man whose character possessed a singular charm, a man of humour, and with a real, if rather scanty, vein of poetry—Mr. Thomas Davidson. His memoirs—The Life of a Scottish Probationer—were published by the Rev. James Brown (Maclehose, 1877), and ought to be read by any one who is interested in two touching and edifying lives. When Mr. Thackeray edited the Cornhill he published Mr. Davidson's youthful piece, Ariadne in Naxos, and we may believe that he remembered Pen's famous epic on that theme. But Mr. Davidson's Ariadne was much less representative of his talent than his charming song, "The Auld Ash Tree," and his many delightful and humorous letters. It was in 1863 that he became acquainted with Miss Dunlop, to whom, during a long and unfulfilled engagement closed by his death, he wrote much, both in prose and verse.

* Anent Old Edinburgh. By Alison Hay Dunlop. Edinburgh: Menzies & Co. 1889.

Yestreen I roamed by Jedwater,
When the sun was set and the dew was down.
An' there was a song in Jedwater,
An' my Ailie's name was its tune.

He never obtained a living, and, when plucked by the Presbytery on one occasion, produced a ditty—

Woe's me that I rejected am—

"which he used to sing to the tune Coleshill." "You see I can enjoy almost anything," he said; and he had the gift of making almost anything enjoyable. Indeed, literature was quite evidently his true business. But his health declined; he died in 1870, and was buried within sound of Jedwater. Among his latest verses was "To Amanda, who has achieved her first white hair":—

"Out, pale traitor," didst thou say?
Prithee, have good counsel, Lady,
Let it grow till all be grey;
All the world is old already;
The world is old, the times wax late,
And youth, my dear, is out of date.

A few months before Mr. Davidson's death Miss Dunlop lost her father, and her own health began to give way. She wisely sought a cure in hard work, and entered her elder brother's business, that of a dealer in old furniture, china, prints, and bibelots in general. Her knowledge was rather puzzling to one of her customers, a lady who thought it judicious to talk French before her, as an unknown tongue, and then to venture on German; in both languages she was proficient. Her place of business, "The Glue Pot," seems to have become a kind of literary centre in Edinburgh, and also a place whence the poor were not sent empty away.

Children also made the discovery that she was a friend worth knowing. Upon condition that they did not come oftener than once a week, and that they left pleasantly when she told them, she was prepared to tell or to weave for them fairy and giant stories without end. One day a little fellow broke the law of not coming oftener than once a week. It was evidently, however, an exceptional case, for, before he was fairly in at the door, he cried out, "Please tell me how the prince got down from that tree." "Th t tree," she repeated, manifestly trying to hark back upon the invention of yesterday. "Yes, Miss Dunlop," said her little friend; "don't you remember how the giant tore all the branches off the very high tree, except the one that hung over the valley filled with snakes?" "Oh yes," she said, picking up the thread of the story; "I mind now. The giant put the prince upon the branch, and there was a 'ramping' lion that never slept, watching at the foot of the tree. We had just got that length when somebody came in and you had to go away. Well, it would be a shame to keep the poor prince for a whole week 'stride-legs' on such a tree."

How that prince got off the tree we never learned.

It is a very great pity that Miss Dunlop did not commit to writing any traditional märchen she may have known. She had one concluding formula which the Reformation might have been expected to obliterate.

And when it pleisit God of his micht,
They all departed to Heaven's licht;
To which bring us the Trinity.
Amen, amen, so let it be;

the narrator and the audience being expected to cross themselves at the end. Miss Dunlop was a great wanderer in the Old Town among the condemned houses, where she and her elder brother occasionally found carved oak and marble under coats of paint and whitewash. She kept a commonplace-book of Edinburgh notes and traditions; but it is undecipherable. Part of her knowledge she published in The Book of Old Edinburgh, and in Anent Old Edinburgh certain articles of hers are reprinted from the Scotsman. The most interesting of them deal with Stockbridge, the ancient village of Dean, and the Baxter's or Bak'r's and other corporations. They are full of the quaintness, kindness, and leisure of a more quiet age, when everything was not machine-made; when Talus, the Iron Man of fable, was not doing all the work cheaply, quickly, and abominably badly; when there was room for most of the population, and the patriotic ardour of the False Alarm had not yet died away. The essays are, as a rule, excellently written, pious in a good sense of the word, noble, and melancholy. Perhaps they are somewhat influenced, but not obtrusively nor unpleasantly, by the style of Miss Dunlop's great friend, Dr. John Brown. The pieces in verse are of little merit, in spite of Dr. Brown's praises; he never could be critical about the work of a friend. But it seems that Miss Dunlop was aware of and not deceived by this virtuous failing in the author of Rab and his Friends. Here is a characteristic anecdote of an old preacher who prayed for George III. when our rightful King and his Highlanders were in Edinburgh:—

Neil M'Vicar invariably wore a "black semmet cowl cap" while preaching, always doffing it reverently during prayer. This fashion of cowl or skull cap was not uncommon amongst ecclesiastics and scholarly men from the time of George Buchanan, and even earlier, down to the eighteenth century, but latterly it must have become somewhat of a necessity in the West Kirk pulpit, for long before the sermon was finished, so insufficient were the walls and roof that the minister's head-gear was covered with a "thin glaister o' sifted snaw!" This story was told to throw into contrast the luxurious comfort and warmth of the present church, then in its comparative youth, and doubtless at the same time to expose that ever-increasing and contemptible effeminacy which, in the eyes of all Spartan seniors, is the undying attribute of every younger generation, albeit that any means of heating churches, except by that of a crowded congregation, were still unknown.

Miss Dunlop's book is a perfect "Glue Pot" of historical bric-à-brac, only less rich and precious than Mr. Chambers's Traditions of Edinburgh. But the most original and charming thing in the volume is found in the concluding papers on Yarrow and the college life of Edinburgh, as they were in Mungo Park's time, while Dunbar was Professor of Greek, and the Town Guard, hated by Fergusson, still used their Lochaber axes over-freely in town and gown rows. It is not easy to quote from this excellent study, where all is harmonious, and the Lowland Scotch is so pure. Miss Dunlop's book should be read by every one who has seen, or intends to see, Old Edinburgh; and all who read it will regret that it is so brief. The close of her own life may be briefly told. She and her brother retired from business and planned a tour, or rather a travel—not in Europe only, but in Africa and the East. She had also proposed to edit her mother's reminiscences of Sir Walter Scott; and we regret to say that she conceived it to be her duty to utter a counterblast against "what she esteemed the modern idolatry of John Graham of Claverhouse." But who has been making an idol of Bonny Dundee? None of these designs were to be accomplished. A terrible disease declared itself; and, after a heroic endurance, she died on the 3rd December, 1888. Readers who find that they have made a new friend in Miss Dunlop will trust that her reminiscences of Scott, at least, will not be left unedited.

CHRISTMAS CARDS.

WE have, as usual, received from Messrs. Raphael Tuck & Sons a beautiful collection of Christmas cards, the designs of which are, if possible, even happier than those of last year. The butterfly with eight wings, instead of two, all prettily illustrated; the strawberry, which discloses a leaf and beetle when opened, are amongst the most original of the folding cards. Then there are pretty landscapes in the now fashionable white frames, cats in hampers, cats at the opera, a cat's wedding, Robin Redbreasts in various forms. Perhaps the quaintest of the animal designs is (5233), representing three puppies. One is, with its hind legs balanced on its two companions' heads, trying to reach a goose on the top shelf of the larder. There are some pretty frosted cards representing country houses, lighted up within; snow and waits without. There is also a very nice owl, which, when opened, is bidding a "Jolly Christmas" to two owlets. The water-lily discloses treasures of words, landscapes, and figures inside it. Then we have six etchings by S. Myers, called "Gems of River Scenery," which are very prettily executed; a booklet illustrating Ingoldsby's legend of "The Jackdaw of Rheims" is also attractive.

Messrs. Bemrose & Sons have contributed some of their usually useful and pretty calendars, amongst which are the "Proverbial Calendar," the "Scripture Calendar," and the "Daily Calendar."

EMPHATICALLY a book of marvels and a marvellous book is The Conquest of the Moon, by André Laurie (Sampson Low & Co.), a book sufficient in itself to make memorable the season, a "white book" for wonder-loving readers, a story that rivals the most ingenious conceptions of Edgar Poe and M. Jules Verne. Those writers are, indeed, suggested by the central idea of the romance, the exploitation of the moon by a young astronomer and his friends; but the scheme and its execution are entirely novel, the author's audacity and inventive power no whit inferior, and the persuasive realism with which he invests his narrative is decidedly superior. The author reverses the old process. He brings the moon to earth, while in Poe's humorous tale and M. Jules Verne's exciting story, the adventurer voyages to the moon. The delightful notion of drawing the moon to earth by magnetic attraction is worked out with exceeding cleverness. The climax, descriptive of the actual impact of the satellite on the peak of Tehbali, is a masterpiece of grandiose phantasy. The transformation of the Soudanese mountain into a vast natural magnet, insulated by a mass of glass manufactured by solar heat condensers and furnaces, is most ingeniously conceived. Indeed, nothing could be better imagined than the entire scheme by which the magnetized mountain is torn away from the earth with the astronomer and his party and annexed to the moon. This tremendous cataclysm occurs while the mountain and observatory are besieged by the Mahdi's forces, and the earth is full of portents like the air. But the admirable quality of the story is its speciousness. Amazing things are done in the moon, and the effect is always to persuade, to fascinate, and to delight, never for a moment to arouse incredulity or that fatal spirit of too-curious inquiry which romancers do most fear. Jack Trevor, R.N., by Arthur Lee Knight (Warne & Co.), is a rousing story of life afloat; the hero a runaway schoolboy, who falls into the hands of smugglers, who carry him to sea, are chased by a revenue cutter, and turn pirates. A capital incident in the long succession of adventures is the escape of Jack, and his rescue by a man-of-war, which overhauls the smugglers' craft, and finds it in sole charge of a bogus skipper. Mr. Knight's story is brightly written, and full of the entertainment schoolboys never tire of. Planned somewhat on the lines of Masterman Ready is The Wreck of the "Argo," by F. G. Fowell (Ward & Downey). The wreck, the island, the home that was defended by a stockade, the attack by savages from a neighbouring island, and the timely delivery of the family—Seymour the name, not Seagrave—by an English vessel, are incidents common to many stories for boys. But the book is a good one in its class, and the interpolated yarns are excellent. The four boys and the parents manage, however, to get through an impossible amount of work in a few months. Mr. Silas Hocking's Tregeagle's Head (Warne & Co.) is a Cornish story of an intensely romantic cast. It deals with the strange disappearance of a young man, and the trial of his friend, who is charged with having murdered him. What is known as "piling up the agony" is a device very effectively employed by Mr. Hocking. The interest of a thrilling narrative is cleverly sustained at fever-heat to the end. Mr. G. T. Bettany's Conquerors of the World (Warne) and The Teeming Millions of the East (Warne) are popular accounts of the various peoples of Europe and Asia, illustrated by numerous woodcuts of a rude or graphic kind. The story of the life of the heroic Bishop Hannington is admirably re-told for young people by his biographer, the Rev. E. C. Dawson, under the title Lion-Hearted (Seeley & Co.) With the text are given reproductions of the Bishop's pen-and-ink sketches and samples of his "nonsense" verses, which are alike full of pleasantry.

Life in the Cheddar district a century ago is vividly depicted by Miss Charlotte Yonge in The Cunning Woman's Grandson (National Society), a story that sets forth the ignorance and savagery of the agricultural population in the good old times when Sedgemoor was yet a vivid memory, and faith in "King Monmouth's" return not quite extinct. Miss Yonge's story is skilfully told, with excellent application of local colour, and an interesting development of plot. We have glimpses of William Wilberforce and Cowslip Green and Miss Patty More; but of the redoubtable Miss Hannah report only speaks. The account of their philanthropic work in Somerset is dexterously interwoven in the story of the wise woman, Granny Lake, and her grandson. Miss Doudney's "Story of a Sanctuary," Where the Dew Falls in London (Nisbet & Co.), is a charming story, originally published last year, and, now appearing in book-form, will doubtless gain many more readers. For small boys and girls we have a collection of excellent short tales, entitled rather superfluously Stories Jolly, Stories New; Stories Strange, and Stories True (Skeffington & Son). When such practised hands combine as Mr. Ballantyne, Miss Corkran, Miss Yonge, Mrs. Molesworth, Mr. Baring-Gould, Mr. H. C. Adams—to name a few of the contributors—there is no occasion to sample or compare samples. Mr. James E. Arnold attempts to mingle amusement and instruction in a story of fairyland—The Seven Golden Keys (Blackie & Sons)—and succeeds by dint of not forcing an excellent didactic purpose. The adventures of Hilda in the country of magic are prettily described. Wisdom and goodness must have smiled benignantly on the birth of the child-heroine of Miss Everett-Green's story, Miriam's Ambition (Blackie & Sons). She is a prodigy among "old-fashioned" children, and her conversation is at times wonderful, if not soothing. Little "Babs," her sister, is more to our liking. She utters her good things unconsciously, as a child invariably does, and is altogether a diverting chit. The House of Surprises (Hatchards) is one of Mrs. Meade's charming stories of children and their ways, so true to nature in the minutest particular as to deserve to be called studies, yet delightfully free from any trace of labour. Mr. Jackson Wray's Geoffrey Hallam (Nisbet & Co.) is a brief but forcibly written sketch of a Yorkshire parish clerk who became "converted," and was near losing his post through his Methodism, but was found too useful a man by his Vicar.

Of the rich assortment of picture-books for the young, made up of stories, nursery rhymes, fairy tales, and so forth, the prettiest of all is Kate Greenaway's Book of Games (Routledge & Sons). Miss Greenaway never hit on a happier subject for her graceful and exquisite art than this, nor has the artist illustrated one with greater sympathy or charm. These quaint and beautiful designs are admirably reproduced in colour by Mr. Edmund Evans. The games they illustrate are the good old sports not yet altogether forgotten. Here are the daintiest little figures, frocked and capped and sashed, as we all love to see them, playing at "Queen Anne and her Maids" in an old walled garden, or at "Mary's gone a-Milking," or "Blind Man's Buff," "Mulberry Bush," "Frog in the Middle," and other pleasant pastimes. Altogether, the most pleasurable book of diversions that children could possess. From Messrs. Griffith, Farran, Okeden, & Welsh we have a welcome set of old fairy stories, &c., "the Old Corner series," with pretty pictures, Cinderella, Puss in Boots, The Fairy Alphabet, Peter Piper, A, Apple Pie, Little Red Ridinghood; also the Newbery Toybooks, The Book of Playmates, and the Book of Bow-Wows; Sing Me a Song, verses by E. Oxenford, music by H. Scott Gatty, pictures by E. Welby, Linnie Watt, and others, a fascinating conjunction of attractions; The Baby's Museum, a treasury of nursery rhymes and coloured pictures that recall the best period of children's books; and A Ring of Rhymes, by E. L. Shute, a similar collection of rhymes with charming illustrations in colour. From the same publishers we have Granny's Story Book, with delightful drawings in colour of children, animals, and flowers by Mrs. Seymour Lucas, and others in black and white, not less marked by grace and fancy. The stories, too, are of the right kind, easy, colloquial, and simple in style. Among annual volumes we have The Quiver (Cassell & Co.), full of excellent and varied reading, well illustrated; Harper's Young People (Sampson Low & Co.), with attractions that defy enumeration; Our Darlings, edited by Dr. Barnardo (Shaw & Co.), and The Day of Days Annual ("Home Words" Office). We have also to acknowledge a new edition of The Caged Linnet, by Mrs. Stanley Leathes (Shaw & Co.); Our Sunday Book of Reading and Pictures (Griffith, Farran, & Co.); Somebody's Darling, a pretty story, with pretty illustrations, by Mrs. Shaw (Shaw & Co.); and Japanese Jingles, written and illustrated by Kathleen Lucas (Wells Gardner, Darton, & Co.), the designs of which are much superior to the verses.

Holly Leaves, the Christmas number of the Illustrated Sporting and Dramatic News, deals as usual with the things of the season in letterpress and in illustrations. "Ducklings," after Sir J. E. Millais's picture, is a good example of the prints in colour that accompany most Christmas numbers. In black and white Mr. S. T. Dadd, with an effective duelling scene; Miss Kate Greenaway, Mr. Davidson Knowles, Mr. F. Barnard—whose yokel puzzling over a sundial by the light of a lanthorn is excellent—and Mr. John Sturgess, with a spirited scene on the road by night in the coaching days, all contribute to the pictorial section of an attractive number. "Our Captious Critic" puts forth a plaint concerning pantomimes, with sketches by Mr. Bryan, with which we sincerely sympathize; and there are short stories and sketches, suited to all tastes, by Mr. W. W. Fenn, Edith Cuthell, Finch Mason, the Hon. Mrs. Walter Forbes, John Hollingshead, W. H. Pollock, Alfred Watson, F. W. Robinson, and others. The stories are of ghosts, the drama, sport, and other cheerful themes. Mr. Finch Mason's "Got At," a wonderful "trainer's story," tells of an adventurous actress who made a very good thing out of a certain "trial" she witnessed, under the guise of a harmless old lady, which enabled her to spot the Derby winner in a certain dark horse. Mr. Alfred Watson illustrates afresh "the biter bit" in "Making the Running," and shows how the "running" may be made with unexpected energy. Circus life as it is, not as it is supposed to be by certain philanthropists, is the theme of Mr. Walter Pollock's "King Zub," the hero of which is a very gifted dog, who takes to bad courses out of sheer sympathy with his master. The ghost stories by Colonel Garland Matthews and Mrs. Cuthell are decidedly novel. The latter writer "explains" the mystery; but the explanation is so ingenious we are appeased, and do not resent what is becoming a worse than superfluous proceeding.

Messrs. Sockl & Nathan forward samples of their Christmas booklets and cards. Of the former we note as particularly pleasing Longfellow's Flowers, illustrated floral designs and vignettes, by Ada Hanbury and Cloëte Brown; Fairy Fine-Ear's Fancies, by Helen Burnside, with pretty drawings in colour by Jessie Watkins, and The Star Shower, &c., by the late Miss F. R. Havergal, with pictures in monochrome. The novelties in the Christmas cards ought to be first favourites this season. They comprise "Society Portraits" and "autograph cards" of "Our Popular Actors and Actresses," both sets after water-colour drawings by Mr. F. Sargent. The portraits, for the most part, are excellent, both as to colour and likeness; the autographs of Mr. Henry Irving, Mr. and Mrs. Kendal, Miss Ellen Terry, and others, are facsimiles, accompanied by capital drawings in character, and include dramatic quotations and signatures.

FRENCH LITERATURE.

THE delightful lady who has been sent by a kindly Providence to leaven a literature pervaded by the doubtless eminent, but not refreshing, talent of M. Edouard Rod and M. Paul Bourget, has a habit of reprinting her productions in rather puzzling form (1). No one of that fair herd, her admirers, can have forgotten the immortal scene in which Xaintrailles—a very nice person, but not so moral as he should be, and not quite so courageous as his ancestor—makes that astonishing appearance in the virgin chamber of Mademoiselle Eve—Chevalier Eve—is romantically protected by her at the imminent peril of her own reputation, and even happiness, and shows a shockingly white feather in the matter of dropping from windows. But, unless we mistake, the scene was not originally presented or represented in the same concatenation. And, whether it was or no, "Gyp" has now added the revue for marionnettes, entitled Tout à l'égout, "which so did please all Paris and its Jules" last January. The juxtaposition is agreeable, for the noble figure of Eve (by the way, was Moray quite the man for her? We prefer the Duke in the old version), even when relieved by Xaintrailles & Co., including the little wretch Loulou, is almost painful in this time of ours—there is an unpleasant suggestion of intabescantque relictæ about it. These fine feelings need not occur to the reader of Tout à l'égout, which is delightful, but by no means heroic. Moïse, the incarnation of the Ewigjüdische, "étudiant l'art de goufferner les beubles bar leurs bassions," and Stendhal, and "Claude Larcher," and M. Rochefort, and M. Drumont, and M. Floquet, and the General (alas! poor ghost!), and "le jeune décadent," who suffers, but as to the reason of his suffering, "Je n'en sais rien, ni lui non plus," and all the rest, never cease to be amusing, as they are reviewed by no less a person than Venus herself—a Venus Boulangiste (c'est là son seul défaut), a Venus just a little wanting in sentiment ("c'est là son seul autre défaut," as somebody might say), but bonne fille all through.

Count d'Hérissou's peculiar style of writing Reminiscences is now so well known, and so not undeservedly popular, that little direct notice of any new book of his is required. The process (and it is a "process" almost as definite as a process in the arts and crafts) consists in taking a modicum of personal experience, whereof for more than thirty years past the Count has had much; throwing in a good deal of publica materies, tossed up again cunningly enough; and seasoning the whole with not too much pretty shrewd discussion and a strong pinch of somewhat ill-natured personal remark. It makes a very readable dish, a very eatable piece of bookmaking. In the present volume (2) the personal reminiscence, by the aid of diaries, seems to be rather fuller than usual.

In Certains (3) the author of the locus classicus as to the way in which calves make their first appearance on any stage appears as a critic of art dealing with MM. Degas, Rops, "Wisthler," G. Moreau, Chéret, &c. One at least of the names we have mentioned (and that of not the least gifted artist) will suggest that the book is not a Christmas present for young ladies. M. Huysmans begins by laying it down that eclecticism and catholicity are anathema. "L'on ne peut pas sincèrement s'extasier devant Delacroix si l'on admire Bastien Lepage." Well, it depends very much on who "l'on" is; and upon the powers of appreciation with which he has been gifted. And it so happens that we who talk (so gently) to M. Huysmans can do these very two things most sincerely. But what we admit that we cannot sincerely extasiate ourselves before or admire is M. Huysmans's idea of style:—"Encenser en des portulaires phrases les vaches-à-lait académiques des vieux prix." "On ne peut se figurer que ce grillage infundibuliforme soit achevé." And across the waves of Styx we hear another "certain," a Limousin scholar, after waiting for his mate through the ages, cry to H. Huysmans, "Come with fratern morigeration! come, that round thy incurvicervic form I may contort my salutationiferous braches, and with Mimallo-nian bombs sound the taratantara of triumph to thy majesty of style!"

M. Charvériat (4) was a young professor who died last year, aged thirty-four, in Algeria. His posthumous remarks on the Kabyle districts are worth reading, and contain a good deal of careful information.

M. Jules Simon's academic discourses (5) have a certain merit of style which is not possessed in the same degree by more than three or four other living Frenchmen, and they are always welcome when collected—especially as there is usually (and in this case) added a new and interesting preface. The three men who are here discussed are curiously different. Michelet was one of the greatest writers of France; Mignet an excellent scholar, a judicious historian, and a writer, if not of great attraction or vigour, yet admirable in his kind. As for the third person, we are unable to rank him higher than as a mere book-maker, tolerably consistent, and not wholly unconscious in presenting history according to the views of his political party.

A new edition of the late M. Guadet's Girondins (6) deserves mention. The author, a nephew of Guadet the Girondin, who died at a considerable age some years ago, after passing the latter part of his life in charge of an institution for educating the blind, was earlier an historical scholar and littérateur of some distinction. He wrote the present book, which is good, partly to correct and supplement Lamartine's vaguenesses and errors.

M. Boris de Tannenberg's Poésie castillane (7) can only be chronicled here; it may, perhaps, be made the subject of special mention later. And such, for a different reason, must also be the intermediate fate of a new instalment of M. Vitu's always interesting Mille et une nuits (8). They have already reached the seven hundred and thirty-fourth night.

NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

BEFORE Socialism was, there was the individual; and what Socialists term "individualism" was ever a tyranny, whether feudalism, or a strong centralized government, or rank slavery, characterized the age. Such are the articles of faith—a few of them, at least—of a vast number of persons who call themselves Socialists, or sympathize with modern Socialism. Precisely contrary is the view maintained by Mr. T. Mackay in his able and very timely social and economic sketch, The English Poor (John Murray). Mr. Mackay argues that Socialism is nothing new, and that the record of history reveals "the gradual and painful emancipation of the individual" from Socialistic tyranny. And the emancipation, so far from being complete at the present day, is, as Mr. Mackay completely demonstrates, threatened by fresh retrogression to the bondage of barbarous ages by the plausible panaceas of those who advocate State Socialism, by "Government interference with the mobility of property," and by much recent meddling and peddling legislation of the merely sentimental kind. Apart from Mr. Mackay's main thesis, the most valuable portion of his book is its defence of property, both as the product of individual thrift and as a social institution. Property and civilization, as Mr. Mackay shows, have progressed hand in hand, property being "a main condition of survival in civilized society." In a civilized state, with feudalism abolished, and freedom of the individual established, the "necessity of property," to use Mr. Mackay's phrase, and its unequal distribution, are facts that would need no enforcement if it were not for the active propaganda among the people of the sick fancies of Socialistic reformers. If there be a law of survival in these as in other matters, it is as idle to vapour concerning it as to use naughty words about the law of gravitation. But even more important to society than property itself are the "instincts which property engenders," and the true social problem of the day, Mr. Mackay insists, lies in the development of these instincts in the masses of the people. By "instincts of property" is meant, not the craving for confiscation, but habits of thrift, independence, and self-help which the sense of responsibility evolves. But while these may be developed in various ways—and there are "many roads by which the labouring classes may, to use the expressive phrase of Hallam, creep into freedom and property" (p. 173)—Mr. Mackay proceeds to show, nevertheless (p. 240, et seq.), that there are serious obstacles on these roads. On the other hand, the more complicated subject of insurance, being free from Government competition, as Mr. Mackay points out, has been dealt with by the working classes themselves to their own satisfaction and to their varying requirements. And here, again, as repeatedly throughout the book, the author emphasizes the lesson of State interference with individual action.

Mr. W. S. Gilbert's volume of stories and sketches, Foggerty's Fairy; and other Tales (Routledge & Sons), possesses for playgoers a rather uncommon kind of interest, as it contains the original forms of some of the author's most popular dramatic writings, The Sorcerer, The Wicked World, and so forth. With the exception of the sketch entitled "Comedy and Tragedy," these stories were all written without any view to dramatization. That they are characterized by drollery and wayward invention is sufficiently obvious; yet no one, we think, will find they are as effective in the reading as on the stage. "Foggerty's Fairy" is an exception to this conclusion, and "Johnny Pounce" is a capital example of the short story, and full of dramatic suggestiveness. Perhaps the most disappointing of the set is the allegorical sketch, "The Wicked World," which appears thin and crude compared with the play developed from it.

The theatrical novel ought, in these days, to circulate in a wide circle of readers, granted that brightness of style and variety and vitality in its pictures of stage life distinguish it. These elements of popularity certainly exist in plenteous measure in Mr. John Coleman's "story of the modern stage," The White Lady of Rosemount (Hutchinson & Co.) Of incident there is good store, of sensation enough, and of movement and diversity of scene and action more than enough to make the story "go" briskly.

Somewhat akin to an artist's note-book, in which fleeting impressions are recorded, often with the warmth of inspiration that will not brook delay, is the volume of reflections, character sketches, musings and meditations, entitled In Thoughtland and in Dreamland, by Elsa D'Esterre Keeling (Fisher Unwin). These brief jottings, the briefer the more individual they are, are marked by a genuine flow of fancy, vivified by pathos and humour that are charming and at times decidedly refreshing. The sketches of servant-girls, of German life and character, of "Five Old Ladies," are delightfully crisp, bright, and neat in delineation. Now and again the book verges into what is known as table-talk, and herein the author is less felicitous. There is sound criticism as well as humour in the following illustration of the author's view of the unfitness for children of Mr. Browning's poetry:—"The Ride from Ghent to Aix" should not be found in books called "Poetry for the Young," and for why? "'I cannot say it' the little girl said. 'Say what? Bring your book to me.' She brought it; and—her eyes filled with tears—pointed out this line, Rebuckled the cheek-strap, chained slacker the bit.

I took her on my lap. 'Come, that isn't so hard; say it.'

Rebuckled the cheap strap—.

Two sweet solemn eyes were fixed on mine. 'No, dear; that isn't quite right. Once more.'

Rebuckled the sleek chap—.

And so it goes on to 'rebuckled the sleep trap'—and the child is bidden to take it slowly, and, with a great effort and 'a comma between every word,' it came—

Rebuckled, the, cheek, strap—

'That's my dear child! Now go on'—

Chained strapper the bit."

"This was too much for me"; and the unfortunate child gave up Mr. Browning.

To "Bohn's Standard Library" a new translation is added of the Pensées—The Thoughts of Blaise Pascal (G. Bell & Sons)—from the edition of M. Auguste Molinier, by Mr. C. Kegan Paul.

Priest and Puritan (New York, &c.: Brentano's) is a readable little story with a good sketch of Methodist revivalism in New England. The healthy mind of the hero withstands the prolonged assaults of the sensational movement, the progress of which is forcibly presented. The result is satisfactory in the end, for the minister himself saw the error of his views, and gave up special revivals, because a happy time arrived when, as one of the body declared, "Every buddy's revived every time they go ter meeting."

Hard Hit! by Morrice Gray (Hatchards), is a short and slight story of the fortunes of two young men, twin brothers, in the Crimean War, one of whom is shot through misadventure by a Zouave officer, who endeavours to force him to a duel, under the impression he is the object of the Zouave's jealousy. The incident is striking, yet the story is curiously unimpressive.

Some admirable examples of portraiture are to be noted in the November issue of Dignitaries of the Church (Hatchards), which comprises photographs of the Bishop of Worcester, the Bishop of Limerick, and Canon Body, by Mr. Samuel A. Walker, with accompanying biographical sketches. No finer gallery of contemporary portraits is now publishing than Mr. Walker's.

We have received new editions of The Faith and the Gospel, by Arthur James Mason, B.D. (Rivingtons); Kingsley's Hypatia, the sixpenny reissue (Macmillan & Co.); A Lonely Life, by the Author of Wise as a Serpent, illustrated (Houlston & Co.); and Colonel Colomb's poem, The Cardinal Archbishop (Allen & Co.)

THIS SOCIETY DIFFERS IN ITS PRINCIPLES FROM OTHER OFFICES.

Instead of charging rates higher than are necessary, returning the excess in the shape of periodical Bonuses, it gives from the first as large an Assurance as the Premiums will with safety bear—reserving the whole surplus for those who have lived to secure the Common Fund from loss.

A Policy for £1,200 to £1,250 may thus at most ages be had for the Premium usually charged (with Profits) for £1,000 only; while, by reserving the Surplus, large additions have been given—and may be expected—on the Policies of those who live to participate.

At last Septennial Investigation, notwithstanding the moderate Premiums charged, the SURPLUS declared was £1,051,035. First additions were (with a few unimportant exceptions) from 18 or 20 to 34 per cent., according to age and class.
Other policies were increased 50 and 80 per cent.

The system is one specially suited for Family Provisions. It secures for the Premium paid the largest Assurance during the period when a family is most dependent, and it returns the whole Surplus to those who have proved Good Lives.

The Bonuses to Policies participating which became claims last year averaged 49½ per cent.

"In the preparation of this vigorous and fascinating book Canon Diggle has had the invaluable assistance of Mrs. Fraser, as well as the co-operation of almost all the Bishop's confidential friends. Many fresh letters appear in the book, and it is also enriched with a good portrait, and an illustration of the beautiful effigy in marble in the Cathedral, where his manly and eloquent voice so often held, in years which Lancashire will never forget, the great congregation spellbound. No prelate has yet arisen in the English Church who was less of a priest and more of a power than James Fraser."—Leeds Mercury.

DODO and I. A Novel. By Captain ANDREW

HAGGARD. 1 vol. crown 8vo. 6s.

"The Gnostic brotherhood to which some of the chief characters belong is an admirable conception. . . . The Oriental background and properties, too, are unmistakably genuine. . . . The hero's love affair with Zuleika reads like a story out of the 'Arabian Nights.'"—St. James's Gazette.

"Told in a manly easy style. This book is not unlikely to take the services by storm, whilst its admirers will not be confined to them alone. . . . In short, all lovers of a really good novel, extravagances notwithstanding, should most assuredly secure this one, and make haste to join 'the charmed circle of the goodly company.'"—Admiralty Gazette.

THE NEW FAR WEST and the OLD FAR EAST: being an Account of Recent Travel and Observation along the Line of the Canadian Pacific and Manitoba and North-Western Railway, thence to Japan, China, Ceylon, &c. By W. HENRY BARNEY, Author of "Life and Labour in the Far, Far West." With 3 Maps and 8 Page Illustrations.

"Mr. Barney's new volume adds materially to the current knowledge of Western Canada, and may be studied with profit even by those who are themselves well acquainted with the general features of the regions which the Canadian Pacific Railway has opened up to the tourist and the settler."—Canadian Gazette.

"Mr. Barney is a traveller who makes the tour of the world in a business manner and in a business frame of mind. In the first sentence of his 'New Far West and Old Far East,' he steps 'on board' the main line of the Canadian Pacific, and he keeps busily noting useful agricultural and commercial facts, with only a moderate attention to the literary graces, until he reaches Suez. His Canadian chapters are the freshest and fullest of practical interest; and he is able to speak, from observation and inquiry, respecting the capabilities, not only of the country between Winnipeg and Vancouver City, but of the 'park-like lands of the fertile belt' traversed by the Manitoba and North-Western Railway."—Scotsman.

"But we have left ourselves no space to speak of the part of the trip which Mr. Barney himself evidently looked upon as a holiday after the more serious work done in Canada, and we can only say, generally, that the travels in a jinriksha, or hand-drawn go-cart, in the 'Old Far East' are not less entertaining than those accomplished on the rails of the Canadian Pacific in the West. The attractions of the book are greatly increased by excellent maps and illustrations."—Manchester Guardian.

"The latter half of the book is a description of a journey through the 'Old Far East'—i.e. Japan, China, Ceylon, and Egypt—well and amusingly written, and illustrated by photographs of the most interesting localities. There are also excellent maps of the various districts visited."—Birmingham Gazette.

SEAS and SKIES in MANY

LATITUDES; or, Wanderings in Search of Weather. By the Hon. RALPH ABERCROMBY. Demy 8vo. with 3 Maps, 9 Photographs, and 33 Woodcuts by Pritchett, Whympere, Cooper, &c., cloth extra, 18s.

"This is not an ordinary book of travels. It has been written mainly for the purpose of calling attention to such phenomena of the sky and weather as Mr. Abercromby has observed in various parts of the world. . . . He gives an account of a voyage round the world, beginning with what he saw in Egypt, and passing on to descriptions relating to Australia, New Caledonia, Fiji, New Zealand, Cape Horn, and Rio Janeiro. . . . He by no means confines his narrative to matters specially attractive to meteorologists. He takes interest in many different classes of subjects, and has something more or less memorable to record about almost all the places he has visited. It is, however, meteorology that he keeps chiefly in view, and we need scarcely say that on this subject, which he has so long and carefully studied, his book is always fresh and instructive."—Nature.

"Mr. Abercromby's book is really the record of a pioneer. For though, as he says, there is no more adventure to be had now on an ordinary voyage round the world than on a journey from London to Edinburgh, and though naturalists have scoured the globe in all directions in quest of special geological, botanical, or zoological facts, nobody else has yet made meteorology the prime object of his travelling by sea and land. Mr. Abercromby's discoveries are chiefly in the domain of 'Cloudland'; and on a comparatively thin thread of personal narrative he has strung together the highly valuable and curious information he has collected concerning the aspects of the sky and the laws of the air-currents of the different regions through which he travelled. . . . All that he has to tell is worth listening to."—Scotsman.

WORKS BY JAMES CROLL, LL.D., F.R.S.

STELLAR EVOLUTION and its RELATIONS to GEOLOGICAL TIME. Large post 8vo. cloth, 5s.

"All men of science who pay due heed to the ultimate principles to which they are perforce brought in the course of their researches will find this work deserving a thorough scrutiny. Mr. Croll has swept away a cloud which seemed at one time likely to obscure the general significance of evolution."—Chemical News.

"If Dr. Croll has not finally settled the theory of creation, he has at least made a most substantial contribution towards the discussion of the great problem in physics which yet remains for philosophers of the foremost rank to settle."—Philosophical Magazine.

"Dr. Croll's book, though chiefly dealing with the question of stellar evolution from the astronomer's point of view, calls in the evidence afforded by geology, in favour of the theory which is set forth in its pages. The particulars of the theory are clearly stated, and the new facts which have been gathered since the theory was first published are fully considered."—Nature.

HISTORY, 1780-1880. By J. H. ROSE, M.A., formerly Classical Scholar of Christ's College, Cambridge. 420 pp. with 3 Maps, and 5 Plans of Battles in the text.

"Accurate, fair, and moderate in tone."—Saturday Review.

"Remarkable for the clearness of its style and for its systematic and orderly arrangement."—Morning Post.

"The handiest book of reference with which we are acquainted."—Pall Mall Gazette.

"Succinct, able, and clear summary."—Spectator.

"Would be an excellent groundwork for lessons or lectures to higher forms."—Journal of Education.

"The book is written from a popular standpoint, but it admirably fulfils its author's intentions; and we certainly know of no work in the same compass which gives anything like as clear, concise, and well-arranged information concerning the march of political affairs in Europe during a century which has been crowded with epoch-making events."—Leeds Mercury.

CANADA.—A Memorial Volume.

A Statistical and Descriptive Handbook of the Dominion. Prepared under the authority of the Government of the Dominion and of the various Provincial Administrations. Edited by E. B. BIGGAR, Montreal. Thick demy 8vo. with numerous Maps and Illustrations, 10s. 6d.

"This will be found a very useful and complete book of reference dealing with Canada. It contains much of the information issued in the Government's 'Statistical Abstract,' and, besides, each province is treated in a separate article, the whole forming a comprehensive statement of the industries and resources of the Dominion and its constituent parts. The volume is well illustrated, and contains maps of all the provinces."—Empire.

"Mr. Biggar has within the covers of his Memorial Volume embraced a wider and further range of information than can be found in any other publication with which we are familiar."—Montreal Gazette.

Prince KRAFT ZU HOHENLOHE INGELFINGEN. Translated by Lieut.-Colonel N. L. WALFORD, R.A. Crown 8vo. cloth, 6s.

"We need hardly remark that the value of these letters written by such a high authority is immense. The book should be in every officer's hands."—Admiralty and Horse Guards Gazette.

"No more attractive and readable essays are to be found in military literature. . . . Colonel Walford has done a great service to the public by translating them, and to the new school of Volunteer officers they will be simply invaluable."—Manchester Guardian.

LETTERS on CAVALRY. Crown

8vo. with 3 Folding Plans of Battles, cloth, 6s.

LETTERS on ARTILLERY. Crown

8vo. with 6 Folding Plates, cloth, 7s. 6d.

"Under an assumed controversial form, these 'Letters' are distinctly authoritative—as might, indeed, be expected from such a master of the art; and, under the heads of apparently discursive dissertations, they collect all the decisions afforded by hard experience as to the value of current, and in many cases rather conflicting, theories concerning the true part of artillery in war."—Saturday Review.

NICE and its CLIMATE. By

of UNIVERSAL GEOGRAPHY. Quarto Edition, containing 46 Coloured Maps, carefully drawn, and beautifully engraved on Steel and Copper Plates, and an Alphabetical Index to the Geography of the World. Half-morocco, cloth sides, gilt edges, 30s. Size, when shut, 12½ in. by 15; weight, 4 lbs. 8 oz.

"It was designed, and several of the maps were drawn and engraved, by Arrowsmith; these have been brought up to date, and the additional ones are not unworthy of being placed alongside the work of the chief of English cartographers. They seem all abreast of the latest information, the execution leaves little to be desired, and the colouring is tasteful and really helpful."—Times.

"We have already commented on the pains which appear to have been taken to work up the maps to the latest dates; we may add that they are excellent specimens of engraving and colouring, that the great difficulty of marking mountain ranges, &c. without obscuring the names, has been excellently surmounted, and that we have detected very few misprints. As what may be called a medium atlas for general use, something between the cheap but meagre school collections and the elaborate but rather costly and unwieldy library atlases, the 'London Atlas' deserves hearty recommendation."—Saturday Review.

"Mr. Stanford's 'London Atlas of Universal Geography' possesses the twofold advantage of consisting really of new maps, with one or two exceptions never before published, and having been completed on the lines laid down by the late Mr. Arrowsmith. Indeed, several of the maps are by that prince of British geographers, and exhibit all the minuteness, care, and good taste for which he was distinguished. The maps wholly prepared at Mr. Stanford's own establishment need not, however, fear comparison with these. . . . A good index enhances the value of this excellent atlas."—Athenæum.

CHARTS of the CONSTELLA-

TIONS from the North Pole to between 35 and 40 Degrees of South Declination. By ARTHUR COTTAM, F.R.A.S. 36 Charts, each 30 inches by 22, printed on drawing paper, and supplied folded in half in a Portfolio, or flat, if preferred. Price £2 net per Set.

As soon as 200 Sets are sold the price will be raised to £3 3s. Early application is therefore desirable.

With one exception (Hydra) each Constellation is shown complete on a single Chart. The Scale is one-third of an inch to a degree, and all the Double Stars in the Catalogues of the two Struves are shown. (Detailed Prospectus, with Specimen Chart, free on application.)

"Surely this is the very luxury of stellar cartography, for from the days of Bayer downwards, nothing has appeared comparable with the splendid series of charts now before us for the special purpose for which they are intended. . . . It has been reserved for Mr. Cottam to produce what, for employment with instruments having motions only in altitude and azimuth, is as near perfection as any delineation of the celestial concave on a plane surface is ever likely to be. . . . The amount of labour expended on this splendid work must have been enormous. No astronomical library or observatory of any pretensions can afford to be without it, and we can hardly conceive a more appropriate birthday present or Christmas gift to a youth developing a taste for astronomy than the volume, as useful as it is sumptuous, which Mr. Cottam has given to the world."—English Mechanic.

"They are engraved on excellent drawing paper, with a clearness and accuracy which can hardly be surpassed."—Athenæum.

by LLOYD C. SANDERS. With Preface by Earl COWPER. 1 vol. 8vo. 18s.

THE TIMES.—"This selection from Lord Melbourne's papers, which has been judiciously edited and illustrated by Mr. Sanders, being almost all of it new, throws considerable light on the character of a man, who, as statesman and politician, is still something of an enigma, and has possibly been much misunderstood. . . . The book is all the more readable for its relative brevity. The specimens of his letters and of those that were written to him are sufficient, for they happen to touch on the subjects in which we are naturally most interested, and they illustrate all the successive stages of his career."

POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

No. 1,781, Vol. 68.

December 14, 1889.

[Registered for Transmission abroad.]

Price 6d.

ON the 4th of January next, being the date of the first appearance of the Saturday Review for the New Year, we propose to introduce a new feature which will, despite its novelty, be in accordance with all traditions of the paper. Comment on news, and not mere news by itself, has always been the main object of this periodical. But since its foundation the events which are brought before the public have multiplied immensely. A considerably wider scope of interest has been opened to those persons whose attention the Saturday Review has always desired, and these persons have acquired the habit of demanding somewhat more prompt and direct notice of incidents within that scope. In one department, moreover, wherein the Review has from the first made and retained its mark, the reviewing of books, a custom has grown up of hastening notices of important works so as to make such notice appear as quickly as possible after the actual publication of any remarkable book. It has never been the custom or the wish of the managers of this Review to regard themselves as mere caterers for the public taste; but they are as little disposed to neglect that taste when it can be consulted without impropriety. And it has seemed to them that a weekly chronicle or criticism of all the more important events of the sennight, whether political, foreign, or domestic, whether literary, artistic, or miscellaneous, might be not only welcomed when done, but worth the doing. Nothing of exactly the same kind as is now proposed has yet been put before an English public; and though some foreign periodicals have aimed, at least in title, at something of the sort, no periodical known to us has actually attained to it. Only matters of actual importance or of great public interest will be referred to, and in each case the reference will aim at the character of a brief criticism or judgment rather than of a mere entry in a Dictionary of Dates. Noteworthy books of the week will be referred to in the same way, and noteworthy events in the various departments of art, as well as such miscellaneous matter as seems to deserve notice. Such notice will in no case exclude fuller and more detailed comment either simultaneous or subsequent in the leader, "middle," or review columns of the paper. Personal gossip will not only not be attempted, but will be rigorously excluded; and the main attempt will be devoted to the furnishing of a critical summary of the chief events of the week of all kinds, such as may be useful either to those who, knowing the facts, care to see them connectedly considered, or to those who like to have a summary, and yet not a mere summary, of the movements of the world put at short intervals before their eyes. If the project can be carried out, as it is hoped and believed that it may be, the Saturday Review will offer, to a generation more studious of miscellaneous novelty than that to which it first presented itself, a representation of affairs more extensive than that at present given by any weekly paper, and more select, critical, and concentrated than is possible in the omnium gatherum of a daily journal.

MR. ROBERT BROWNING.

THE career of the author of Sordello was so almost entirely literary that less even than is usual need be said about any other side of it. His marriage with a great, though unequal, poetess, and the sort of sentimental interest which, in common with, or in obedience to, her, he took in the cause of Italian independence, form almost the only two points of a non-literary kind which deserve even passing reference. For posterity—at least the wiser part of it—he will be entirely in his poetry, and for the wisest part of that wiser part he will be not universally even there. It is unnecessary at the present moment to dwell on the unintelligent recalcitrance which the public showed for so many years to Mr. BROWNING's genius; it is still more unnecessary to dwell on the equally unintelligent BROWNING-worship—worship, of course, of the idol's feet of clay, and not of its head of gold—which followed. The obscurity of Paracelsus and Sordello was vastly exaggerated, but it existed to some extent; and with the poet's still stranger fancy for grotesque twists of language, for crambo rhymes, and occasionally for verses which creaked like horse-fiddles, it must be allowed to have been a flaw in his poetic gift. Such things necessarily imply either deficiency of power to restrain them, or a fondness for flinging defiance in the public face—two different forms of poetic "impotence." When the whirligig of time gave Mr. BROWNING his revenges for slighted merit, it took its own at the same time for indulged defect. The fanatics of the Browning Society admired the defects most of all (which was one punishment), and Mr. BROWNING himself took to imitating and caricaturing them (which was another). But, from the very first to the very last, from Pauline to Asolando, it was impossible that any competent judge, unless temporarily blinded and exasperated by prejudice and the poet's provocations, could fail to see how great a poet was here. Posterity may neglect, and probably will neglect, except in rare dippings and excursions, the whole series of narratives—or whatever they are to be called—from The Ring and the Book to Parleyings with Certain People of Importance. It will, perhaps, not be enthusiastic even about most of the dramas, and it may choose to hear but a small part of SORDELLO's story told. But that part of it which knows poetry when it sees poetry will place Dramatic Lyrics, and Dramatic Romances, and Men and Women, and Christmas Eve and Easter Day, and Pippa Passes, and Dramatis Personæ, and many of the shorter things from the later books, apart and on high among the noblest work of English verse.

Among Mr. BROWNING's poetical virtues, numerous as they are, may be placed his singular sympathy with the most various forms and experiences of life, his dramatic-pictorial faculty (the strong pictorial element in this is probably the reason why he never wrote a good play), his excellent touch of description (a touch peculiar to himself, and consistent sometimes with the minutest detail, sometimes with a broad effect of few lines), and the wonderful rush and sweep of his best verse. Almost all rushing rivers are more or less turbid, and it may be that this very fluency and torrent of ideas never, as in some other cases, venting themselves in merely disproportionate fluxes of words, accounts for some of the roughness and "jawbreaking" with which he was charged. It is certain that he could on occasion be exquisitely smooth, and that with no loss of power. But his immense variety of subject, his volume of production, and, it may be, a certain deficiency of that self-critical power which is so remarkable in his greatest contemporary, disposed him irresistibly to faults, which certainly are faults, though they were outweighed a hundred times by his innumerable beauties. It will always be a puzzle—a puzzle easily enough perhaps to be understood, but not so easy to be explained in words—how the author who could, apparently with no great additional effort, turn out hundreds of such admirable things as meet us at every turn in the Lyrics, should have, apparently with complacency, resigned himself to pouring forth, with trouble nearly as great, the thousands of lines of blank or rhymed verse which, except to devotees seeking midi à quatorze heures, and hopefully but doubtfully convinced that they have found it, are very little better than the parodies which have been often made on them.

To pass from merely formal characteristics, we have ourselves no doubt that Mr. BROWNING's immortality as a poet will rest upon two things, the one being his indomitable—not exactly optimism, but determination to find and make life worth living; and, secondly, or, indeed, as a kind of division of this, his extraordinary merit as a poet of love. All good poets, with rare and abnormal exceptions, like MILTON and WORDSWORTH, are best when they sing of this subject; but few are Mr. BROWNING's superiors in that branch of the art, and few have ever equalled him in a certain combination of vigour, variety, and volume. He has the quality of enthusiasm and rapture which is wanting, save in the great tour de force of "Fatima," to the exquisite work of the LAUREATE in this kind; he is more practical than Mr. SWINBURNE. There is hardly any mood of the passion which cannot find its expression in the best of Mr. BROWNING's verse, and he has the singular faculty of being able to make even the wearing of the willow dignified and interesting without sentimentality. "The Last Ride Together"—his masterpiece, perhaps (we once read a long book of liturgical meditations on Mr. BROWNING, in which this poem was not even mentioned)—would be, but for one or two tiny blemishes—minute blemishes due to the poet's too careless facture—one of the few perfect poems ever written. "In a Gondola" runs it hard; in fact, it is very much more a question of mood in the reader than of merit in the writer. And who can forget "Love among the Ruins," with the restrained quiver of its apparently sober metre; and the magnificent "Love's Immortalities" ("So the year's done with. Love me for ever!"), and that "Toccata of Galuppi's;" and, to stop a catalogue which would be out of place here, a hundred other things, down to lines published even after the announcement of the author's illness?

It is, however, not improbable that the peculiar charm of Mr. BROWNING's verses consists, partly at least, in the great variety of quite different matter with which these love verses are intermixed. Of such variety certainly no poet ever provided his readers with larger measure. Here catalogue is impossible; but one may recall such specimens as the almost hackneyed "Ride to Aix" and "Pied Piper," as the admirable "Cavalier Songs" and "Through the Metidja," as "The Flight of the Duchess," as "Childe Roland," as "The Grammarian's Funeral," and as almost every piece in Dramatis Personæ (the book of the poet, the most varied, the most uniformly good, the most representative, the happiest middle between immaturity and self-caricature, and possessing in "Prospice" perhaps the grandest of contemporary poems). Although no English poet is less like SHAKESPEARE than Mr. BROWNING in most respects, there is something of Shakspearian universality in him, something of that inexhaustible novelty which would seem at first sight the last merit likely to be perceived in a poet so steeped in mannerisms. But the truth is that Mr. BROWNING, though unfortunate enough to have a mannerism, was fortunate enough to have a manner, and a grand manner, too, and this never deserted him, even when he went a-wandering after the other. He had souffle, he had distinction, he had even (reckless as he too often was of it) style. So strong was his attraction, that we have known a rational admirer solemnly swear that he would not be prevented from reading "The Last Ride Together" and "In a Gondola" as often as he pleased, though a dictator should force him to read Red Cotton Night-Cap Country and Balaustion's Adventure on each occasion. And yet not twenty years ago a really intelligent and fairly cultivated person, beholding on a friend's shelves a row of books with ROBERT BROWNING on the back, exclaimed, "Why, I thought she was a woman!" That, however, is long over, and though Browning Societies and the seeking of new points in Prince HOHENSTIEL-SCHWANGAU's soul will go the way of all follies, Mr. BROWNING's reputation will never fade. For he loved this life, and he could sing of it like few; and he did not love it the less or sing of it the worse because he believed in another. He, too, might say, in those great verses of his great contemporary which appeared almost at the moment of his death:—

Twilight and evening bell,
And after that the dark.
And may there be no sadness of farewell
When I embark.

For tho' from out our bourne of Time and Place
The flood may bear me far,
I hope to see my Pilot face to face
When I have crost the bar.

REVOLUTION A LA ROSEBERRY.

IT is interesting to watch the friendly rivalry with which Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT and Mr. JOHN MORLEY pursue their candidature for the paulo-post-future leadership of the Liberal party. Among Dissenters, we believe, there is a practice which is known as preaching trial sermons. When a pulpit, offering what, in the decorous euphemism of the profession is called a large sphere of usefulness, becomes vacant, zealous divines exhibit their respective qualifications for the cure of souls in competitive prayers and sermons. As the feathered youth—to use a phrase which the poet GRAY might have employed—in the season in which young birds', as well as young men's, fancies lightly turn to things of love, and the dove is adorned with a brighter iris, show off their plumes and notes before the hesitating fair, so Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT and Mr. MORLEY are emulously endeavouring to win the heart of the Gladstonian party. It is CLEON and the Sausage-seller over again, with the important difference that CLEON and the Sausage-seller have been reconciled, and have discarded sincere vituperations for politic flatteries. So far as we can gather, the judgment passed closely resembles that arrived at by MAGOG WRATH or BULLY BLUCK, or some equally high authority, on the two candidates for Dartford. Mr. MORLEY's language, it is admitted, is not so spicy as his rival's; "but then he speaks from his 'art'; and give me the man who speaks from his 'art.'" In other words, Mr. MORLEY is believed to be, comparatively speaking, honest. We are speaking now only in terms of comparison, without denying that quality, in its positive sense, to either politician. But Mr. MORLEY does not seem to us to be quite as wise as he is honest. The SPEAKER told the Fellows of the Royal Society the other day that there were only five men of science in the House of Commons. Whether he wanted more, or wished they were still fewer, he did not say. We do not know how many men of letters there are in the House of Commons, nor do we know with any precision who is a man of letters and who is not. If some of Mr. MORLEY's later speeches are samples of the wisdom which literature contributes to the deliberations of Parliament, we should be tempted to Lord MELBOURNE's disparaging estimate of the class. If Mr. MORLEY is, as we admit, both honest and wise, he seems to act in the spirit of HAMLET's advice to OPHELIA, and not to admit his honesty to any commerce with his wisdom. The two qualities are apparently not on speaking terms in his mind. They run on parallel lines, and, apparently, have little chance of meeting.

Mr. MORLEY seldom condescends to detail. He is almost always declamatory and sentimental. But in his recent speeches he has made one practical suggestion, and, so far as we can recollect, only one; that is to say, he has proposed that something should be done which it is not in the nature of things impossible to do. Whether it would be useful to do it is a different matter. Some time ago Mr. MORLEY contributed to the reform of the House of Lords the phrase that it must either be ended or mended. The suggestion which he now makes is neither for ending nor for mending it, but for going on with it in an impaired condition. Mr. MORLEY, before proceeding to his solitary contribution to practical politics, enunciated, as the way of philosophers is, one or two political axioms. "A peer," he said, and Dundee applauded loudly, "ought to be in no better position than any other man." The conclusion from this proposition is that either everybody ought to be a peer, or that nobody ought to be a peer. This axiom is balanced by the counter-proposition that a peer ought to be in no worse position than any other man. From these principles Mr. MORLEY draws the conclusion that a peer ought to have the advantage, for some purposes, of being both a peer and a commoner at the same time, and of being, for other purposes, either a peer or a commoner, as may suit his taste or his ambition. Mr. MORLEY's statement had better be made in his own language. He is his own interpreter, though whether he will make it plain or not is doubtful:—"The suggestion," says that great constructive statesman, "which seems to me most worthy of your favourable consideration is this—that any individual peer who chooses formally to declare his option to give up for his lifetime a seat in the House of Lords attaching to his peerage, should be allowed to do so; and on so declaring himself should become eligible for a seat in the House of Commons." We sometimes hear, by a violent metaphor, of statesmen going on the war-path. Mr. MORLEY has betaken himself to the Primrose-path. A greater master of phrases, a not less distinguished man of letters, and a fiercer Jacobin than Mr. MORLEY, ridiculed the idea of a rosewater revolution. What would he have thought, if the thing could have been made intelligible to him, of a revolution à la ROSEBERRY? Mr. MORLEY is thinking neither of strengthening the House of Commons nor even, it may be, of perpetuating, while weakening, the House of Lords, but of obliging his friend. If the thing which he has in view is to be done at all, let it be done openly. Let Mr. MORLEY proceed by way of private and personal legislation, by privilegium. Let him introduce next Session an Earl of ROSEBERRY's Disabilities Relief Bill, enabling that discontented peer to purge himself during his lifetime of his nobility, and to sit, if he can get elected, as of course he would do, in the House of Commons. If there is to be perfect equality, and a peer is to be neither better nor worse off than anybody else, this privilege must be reciprocal. If Mr. MORLEY himself, or Mr. BRADLAUGH, or Dr. TANNER should prefer a safe seat for life in the House of Lords to eligibility to the House of Commons, why, on Mr. MORLEY's principles, are they to be debarred from making the exchange which is to be allowed to Lord ROSEBERRY? To say that this reciprocity is impossible, considering the number of peers which it might involve, is only to say that Mr. MORLEY's proposal, instead of being based on the principle of equality, is of the narrowest oligarchical kind. This is the point which, by way of reductio ad absurdum, we desire to bring home to Mr. MORLEY. The fact is that Lord ROSEBERRY, as whose representative Mr. MORLEY is obviously speaking, desires to be two things at once. He wishes to be, at the same time, a great nobleman and a great commoner—PITT as he was before he became the Earl of Chatham, and PITT as Earl of Chatham. Lord ROSEBERRY is the creation of our aristocratic system. A considerable series of Lord ROSEBERYS, reaching how far back we do not care to inquire, accumulating estates by the matrimonial and other expedients open to peers, and transmitting them by primogeniture and rule of birth, with an hereditary peerage, have issued in him. Does Lord ROSEBERRY think that, if he were simply Mr. PRIMROSE, the son of a long series of simple Mr. PRIMROSES, he would have been a Cabinet Minister and Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs? He might have been, but the chances would have been very much against him. More probably he would have held a permanent appointment in the Civil Service, been Secretary to the Board of Works, or the Board of Trade. Lord ROSEBERRY desires to add to the advantages which he derives from the peerage the opportunities of personal display and of political ambition which a seat in the House of Commons would give him. His demands are extravagant. The Church Catechism was made for him as well as for humbler people, and he ought to learn to be content with that station in life to which Providence has been pleased to call him. To be able to take part in politics without being dragged into the factious struggles of the House of Commons, to have time for thought, to be exempt from the necessity of base electioneering compliances, are advantages which may well be set off against the comparative dulness of the House of Lords. Perhaps it is Mr. MORLEY's design to bleed the House of Lords to death by withdrawing from it its more active and able members. If this is really his aim, it would be more candid in him to state it.

Mr. MORLEY's assertion that the regeneration of Ireland would be accomplished by transferring authority to a Home Rule Parliament—which will consist of boycotters, breakers of contracts, repudiators of debts, and inciters to violent crime—deserves record, but it does not deserve comment. He censures Lord SALISBURY for insisting on the doctrine of supply and demand in regard to labour, and for urging emigration as a means for relieving the labour-market. He says with some truth that our colonies will not take our failures. His own remedy is organization of labour; but he must know that such organization will either exclude those failures, or if it includes them will drag down the whole body to their level. He exults in the probable expulsion of the landlord garrison from Ireland, and invites its expulsion from Great Britain—a proposal which will, we hope, receive due attention at Althorp, Studley Royal, and Dalmeny. Without expressing any opinion upon the merits of Mr. KEAY's plan of land naturalization—which Mr. GLADSTONE declares to be that either of a fool or a robber, using the abstract terms rather than the concrete ones which we have employed—Mr. MORLEY rejoiced in its advocate's return for Elgin and Nairn. All this may be merely the phrasemongering of a young Parliamentary hand, but what is mere claptrap with Mr. MORLEY is taken very seriously by large numbers of those who listen to or read his speeches. To have meant no harm is a poor excuse for having done a great deal.

THE AFRICAN PROBLEM.

GREAT as have, beyond all doubt, been Mr. STANLEY's performances in Africa; ingeniously or fortunately as the reception of intelligence from him since his return has been timed to stimulate, without satisfying, the public appetite for news; and strenuous as is the puffery which certain journalists in London bestow on this, their ideal of a successful journalist, there are not wanting signs that some, at least, of the English public would prefer, if not a little less confidence, considerably more quietness about Mr. STANLEY's demeanour. The singular expressions reported last week, as of one who thought that the mystical attitude of GORDON might be assumed with advantage (but n'est pas Gordon qui veut), probably gave pause to some admirers. And, illogical as it may be, there can be little doubt that EMIN Pasha's sad accident helped others to realize the fact that the rescuer's expressions about the rescued have been, to say nothing more, considerably wanting in delicacy. Telegrams to "Imperator Rex," and the rest of it, with "Imperator Rex," who is good at telegrams, promptly replying in the same style, form a more purely comic element in the business, though even these help to deepen the impression. And Mr. WALTER BARTTELOT should have deepened it very much by his letter to the Times on Mr. STANLEY's almost incredibly bad taste in referring to the unfortunate commanders of the rearguard. These remarks would have been disagreeable in any case; but Mr. BARTTELOT has shown (as, indeed, those who remembered the facts knew well) that Mr. STANLEY is not only ungenerous, but inaccurate. His order to Major BARTTELOT to march was conditional on the supply of carriers by his own precious friend, TIPPOO TIB, and there was no point on which he laid so much stress as on the maintenance intact of the store of goods, which could only be secured either by staying with them or marching with the full number of carriers. That Mr. STANLEY himself, had he been in Major BARTTELOT's place, would have taken the responsibility of disobeying orders when he found that TIPPOO was not to be trusted, is very likely. But it is more than very likely, it is absolutely certain, that if the Major had done this, and disaster had followed, all the resources of special correspondent eloquence would have been tasked to supply Mr. STANLEY with sufficient denunciations of such disobedience. To put men in the most difficult, the most thankless, the most anxious, and—except for its anxiety—the most uninteresting place of an expedition, and then upbraid them for doing what you have told them to do, is not pretty behaviour.

The truth, however, is that Mr. STANLEY appears to be in that condition in which men who have not only deserved success by their conduct, but have obtained it by their conduct, plus that luck of which only fools deny the existence, are not unfrequently found. He appears to have reached the stage of regarding want of success as a crime in itself. Nothing is more unfortunate in EMIN Pasha's unfortunate accident than the inevitable delay which, even if it turn out not to be fatal, it must interpose in the way of our hearing the Pasha's own version of the story of his disasters at Wadelai. At present Mr. STANLEY's story is hearsay, chiefly from Mr. JEPHSON, and Mr. JEPHSON's own story is chiefly hearsay from other people. It is, indeed, not difficult to reconstruct the probable course of events, both from these stories and from general likelihood; but this does not dispense with the necessity of hearing the other side. For the accident itself, it is sincerely to be hoped that it was accidental; but there is nothing so absurd as has been pretended in other theories. All we know of the Pasha leads us to suppose that he must have suffered the keenest pangs in yielding to Mr. STANLEY's persuasion, or compulsion (for it may be said to have been almost that), to accompany him to the coast. Mr. STANLEY thinks that Mr. JAMESON died, partly at least, of grief—a hypothesis convenient for his own theory of the mistakes committed by the leaders of the rearguard, but not confirmed by anything else we know, and totally at variance with impartial testimony to the effect that, a very short time before his death,

Mr. JAMESON showed as cheery and indomitable a spirit as could have possessed any man. But it is not at all impossible (though we do not for a moment assert our belief in it) that EMIN's sense of a rifiuto, of a withdrawal from duty, of there being nothing more to live for, may have been quickened by the healths and the huzzas which greeted Mr. STANLEY at Bagamoyo.

Some day, however, when sufficient ground-bait is thought by the wise ones to have been scattered in the newspapers, when the healths and the huzzas have been repeated in London, in Brussels (hardly, we fear, in Paris, "Imperator Rex" having made this impossible), and perhaps in Berlin, Mr. STANLEY's own account will be given to the world—given, let us hope, with as good an array of solid fact and justification, especially in that matter of the rearguard, as possible. Meanwhile it is curious and characteristic that we know little or nothing of what is actually going on in the Equatorial Province. We do not know whether the Mahdists have absorbed it, whether EMIN's rebels or any other set of persons have set up a government of their own there, or what has happened. There are rumours that order may shortly be restored in Uganda; and, if so, intelligence from the Lake districts will, of course, become more plentiful, more trustworthy, more rapid.

But it would be hardly safe to wait for that. Some German newspapers have, with unnecessary jealousy and ill nature of form, but to some extent with accuracy, asserted that Mr. STANLEY's expedition has in fact failed, because EMIN's province has not been brought under the domination of the British East African Company. We do not know that it was intended to be so brought. The course of the Nile should belong, and sooner or later must belong, to whosoever rules in Egypt, not to whosoever occupies the shores of the Indian Ocean. But various other events show that it will be by no means safe to leave to time and chance the re-establishment of connexion between these two points, by way of the Equatorial districts. The experience of Portugal, so pathetically bewailed by Senhor BARROS GOMES, our own so idiotically incurred on the West Coast of South Africa, in Upper Guinea, in Zanzibar itself, shows that in these days it is not safe to leave anything unclaimed and unmarked in the regular way. More than this, it seems in the highest degree probable that we shall very quickly have to repeat the thankless and endless performance which we have apparently undertaken to give whenever the KHALIFA asks us, on the Nile, somewhere about Wady Halfa. More than once, indeed, threatened invasions of the Dervishes have fallen through; but much more often they have not. Such a government (if government it is to be called) as was established by the MAHDI can exist only by being militant, and it has the peculiar advantage over all other militant organizations that defeat and death hardly discourage it at all. The interesting letter of the KHALIFA's General to EMIN, which was published the other day, might almost have been written by KHALED, if KHALED had been a little more of a literary man, and it will not do to trust too implicitly to the optimism of a respected historian of Islamism, who thinks that a Gatling at the battle of Yermouk might have changed the history of the world. Suppose, for instance, the Gatling had jammed? We are not, of course, anticipating the probability of any such catastrophe as is here hinted at. Even putting superiority of material aside, that is for the present out of the question. But we have more than once "run it rather fine" in those conflicts with the fanatics, and even if the fight at Toski can be repeated with ease and certainty until the Dervishes have had enough of it, the repetition is a singularly unworkmanlike and extravagant way of defending the Egyptian frontier, after fixing it at a place where no natural frontier ever can be fixed. Especially now that Egyptian finance has revived so far, and that so much progress has been made with internal reform, it is time to consider, at first of course cautiously, and without making rash schemes, how to recover that command of the Nile which can never be abandoned without loss and danger. In doing this there are four routes possible. One of them—that by the Congo—may, we hope, now be considered as closed to all but mere adventure for many a long day. The other three—up the river, from Souakim and from Mombassa—will be tried, and tried successfully, sooner or later by somebody, and it will be to our loss and disgrace if they are tried by any but Englishmen.

WHO FEARS TO SPEAK OF NINETY-EIGHT?

WE have not observed any violent hurry on the part of the English Parnellite press to reply to the very interesting letter addressed a few days ago by Colonel SAUNDERSON to the Times. The member for North Armagh has, it appears, been taken to task by several Radical papers, both in England and Scotland, for certain remarks made by him at Belfast the other day, on the occasion of the unveiling of the statue of WILLIAM III., and the letter in question was designed to show that the attitude which he and other Ulster Liberals have taken, and intend to take in certain eventualities—to wit, their surrender by the Imperial Parliament to the domination of the Nationalists—is amply justified not only by the lessons of Irish history, ancient and modern, but by the authoritative statements of our opponents. Colonel SAUNDERSON's appeal to history would not of itself go for much—for no more, perhaps it may be admitted, than Mr. GLADSTONE's reminders of his countrymen, more in sorrow than in anger, that it was their ancestors and not the rebels of '98 who added the "pitch cap" to the previously existing array of political arguments. The Colonel concisely but effectively rehearses the history of the doings of the famous Father MURPHY in the course of the insurrection which exerted so strong an influence on the "blackguard" policy of PITT. He relates how that "excellent parish priest" established his headquarters at Vinegar Hill, sent out gangs of patriots to scour the country and bring in every Protestant that could be found, and how the captives thus brought in were daily taken out and butchered in cold blood, to the number of five hundred. We quite admit, however, that the brisk doings of this patriotic clergyman between the outbreak of the rebellion and his infamous execution by a coercionist Government of worse than Balfourian severity would not, in themselves, avail to prove much against the spirit and aims of the Irish Nationalists of to-day. They are undoubtedly in the nature of "ancient history" nowadays, and, as such, our English Parnellites would have some excuse, perhaps, for declining to notice the recapitulation of them. Articles in United Ireland, however, are not ancient history, but modern journalism; and when we find this delightful print extolling the acts of Father JOHN MURPHY, declaring that his name is "ever memorable and ever dear to the adherents" of the grand old cause that was physically fought out at "Vinegar Hill, and perpetuated in various ways to the present hour"; when we are told that "he is living still in the spirit," and that "there are priests in our country to-day who are no unworthy representatives of the glorious leaders of Vinegar Hill"—why, it might be thought perhaps that here at least is matter demanding the attention of the eminently respectable humanitarians who form the main strength of Mr. GLADSTONE's party in this country, and that they would naturally desire to dissociate themselves in the most pointed manner possible from such infamous extravagances of journalistic truculence. But no. They cannot answer Colonel SAUNDERSON, and they remain silent, though their silence when such outrages as these are printed by the most popular organ of their Irish allies renders them every whit as fully and as disgracefully responsible for them as though they had been displayed in the eminently decorous columns of the Daily News. The answer for the present, therefore, to the question Who fears to speak of '98? seems to be that it is neither the Irish Loyalists on their side nor the Irish Nationalists on theirs; but that the English Gladstonians somehow do not care to join in the conversation.

Neither do they care to say much about several other recent incidents in Ireland—the death of Captain PLUNKETT for one. They were but little behind the gutter journalists of Irish Nationalism were our respectable Gladstonian friends in abuse of that zealous and fearless officer in his lifetime; and they are apparently divided now between the shame of keeping silent about a man whom they know, in that small corner of their minds into which the spite of partisanship has not penetrated, to be eminently worthy of the respect and honour of his countrymen, and the shame of doing tardy justice to a man whom they joined his foul-mouthed slanderers in pursuing with vituperations. They have had to say something, and they have said as little as they could, about Captain PLUNKETT's career of faithful and strenuous services; and they have said nothing at all about, what was very probably the cause of his death, the ferocious assault made upon him a year ago by a ruffian at a Youghal riot. No one can, of course, affirm with positive certainty that a savage blow struck on the head of a middle-aged man, leading a life of anxious work, and involving considerable exposure, has accelerated his death; but there is, at any rate, no little likelihood of this having been the case, and there is a peculiar indecency in the scepticism expressed on the point by the loud-mouthed exploiters of the MANDEVILLE imposture. Another matter, to which only the most shameless of the Parnellite organs in London has ventured upon any reference, is that of the attempted "dynamite" outrage at Woodford. We have not quite got to the point of justifying these methods of carrying on the war (though we don't know what may happen; and Mr. GLADSTONE, perhaps, had better be polishing up his casuistry for application to the Sixth as well as to the Eighth Commandment), and the only course open to Parnellism, therefore, is to discredit the whole story. Whether their theory is that some wicked person placed a keg of blasting powder, with an elaborate arrangement of chemicals attached for igniting it, in an empty house, with the view of compromising a virtuous Nationalist party; or whether they deny that there was any keg of powder, or any chemicals, or any empty house, we do not precisely know. But, inasmuch as the story is a very circumstantial one, inasmuch as it is given on excellent authority, and only conjecturally contradicted by journalistic "witnesses" of about the same sort of weight and respectability as the gentlemen who used to promenade Westminster Hall with straw in their shoes—we are of opinion that the English public are amply justified in attaching at least provisional credit to it. And our advice to the Gladstonians is that, instead of casting about to prove that the "infernal machine" has not been introduced as a new weapon in the holy war against landlordism, they should assume that it was, and devote their time and energies to devising excuses for its introduction. Perhaps they will hardly contend that an attempt to blow up a sheriff and a large party of the Constabulary is other than illegal; but perhaps Mr. GLADSTONE may be able to make out that it is not im- but only extra-moral.

In the meantime they may find excellent practice for their casuistic powers in dealing with the following little incident—an incident so illustrative of the monstrosity of the Ministerial assumption that justice is difficult to obtain in Ireland by "ordinary" processes of law. At the Munster Winter Assizes the other day, at the trial of four men on a charge of moonlighting, MARGARET TWOMY, the prosecutrix, who, in her depositions before the magistrates, had sworn that she was attacked by three men, who bound her hands with cords and ransacked her house, now stated that the prisoners were not the men who attacked her. On being asked by Mr. Justice MURPHY whether she had not previously sworn that they were, she replied that she had, but that "she was out of her senses then." As she adhered to her second story, there was, of course, nothing for it but to discharge the prisoners, who would go forth, as his lordship observed, "men of tried innocence," and as the counsel for the Crown ironically added, "without a stain on their characters." Mr. Justice MURPHY suggested a prosecution for perjury; but it would be hardly possible, even if a conviction were to be obtained against her, to punish this unfortunate woman very severely for the crime of yielding to intimidation. Perhaps Mr. GLADSTONE will turn his attention to the case and consider whether something cannot be said for those who intimidated her. Even we ourselves, unequal though we are as a rule to the handling of the Gladstonian distinguo, can see our way, we think, to the right hon. gentleman's probable line of apology. Intimidation of anybody, for any purpose, is of course a deplorable and reprehensible thing; but whether in this case it admits, we will not say of defence, but of extenuation, will depend upon the object with which the intimidation was practised. Now, it was practised to prevent the Irish Executive from punishing three men for moonlighting, and it is clear that, if the English Government (whose servant the Irish Executive is) be itself morally responsible for the existence of moonlighting, the prosecution of these moonlighters becomes indefensible, and the irregular means taken to defeat this prosecution are excusable. Now, that the English Government is morally responsible for moonlighting, Mr. GLADSTONE is no doubt prepared to prove by a process identical with that by which he so triumphantly demonstrated the moral responsibility of Ministers for the Plan of Campaign. Hence the final judgment of the moralist on this incident is that, though the men who terrorized MARGARET TWOMY into perjuring herself cannot perhaps be held wholly blameless, the main burden of the guilt of that proceeding rests upon the shoulders of HENRY II.

THE TIMES ON M. COQUELIN.

IT is neither kind nor true to say that if the Paris Correspondent of the Times knew a little about politics he would know a little about everything. He would not know a little about M. DE BANVILLE's comedy of Gringoire. The piece is more than twenty years old, it is as familiar as any modern drama to French playgoers, and it has been acted frequently in an English adaptation, the Ballad-Monger. M. COQUELIN, on bringing his sheaves with him as a new kind of thrifty prodigal son, chose to reappear at the Comédie Française in GRINGOIRE. It is a favourite part of his, though perhaps his rendering of the starving poet has more humour and less romance than M. DE BANVILLE intended. The Times Correspondent, solus contra mundum, describes it as "an absurd piece," which is about as good criticism as Mr. SAMUEL PEPYS's remarks on A Midsummer Night's Dream. "It exhibits a gingerbread Louis XI., very inconsistent with 'the great historic figure of the King,' but not so inconsistent, we think, with PHILIPPE DE COMINES, and the other contemporary account which, as the Correspondent ought to know, is derived from QUINTUS SCOTUS, called D'URUARD, a version preserved in the Chronicon Trotcosiense. The Correspondent, indeed, spares us this erudition. He does inform us that Gringoire was written for M. COQUELIN, in which case M. DE BANVILLE must have been very complacent to M. COQUELIN when a lad of twenty-two, for Gringoire is of 1865. A great deal of water, and not a little blood, has gone under the bridges since then. The Correspondent ungallantly adds that Mlle. REICHEMBERG "has been a long time playing 'the artless girl.'" As M. LEMAÎTRE says, this lady cannot help it. At the age of fifty she will still believe that little boys are found under cabbages, and little girls under rose-trees. Nobody is so young, and nobody else is so innocent, as Mlle. REICHEMBERG looks. The second piece was the Dépit Amoureux, written by POQUELIN for M. COQUELIN, with a severe part, that of a Duenna, for Mme. SAMARY, née BÉJARD.

PORTUGAL AND ENGLAND IN AFRICA.

NO Englishman, we trust, will be silly enough or discourteous enough to treat with any want of respect in form the reply of Senhor BARROS GOMES to Lord SALISBURY's protest against the decree creating the new province of Zumbo. A man, even if he is not a Minister, is bound to back his own side. But, giving Senhor GOMES every credit for doing his duty as a patriot and an official, we are bound to say that a weaker set of pleas to establish possession we never read. Throughout Mashonaland "these well-served ruins raise their heads," says the Senhor, in reference to one of his witnesses, the existence of ruined fortalices. Throughout Senhor BARROS GOMES's argument certain claims raise their heads likewise. They are certainly ruins; but are they well preserved? We confess that, after making every allowance for possible prejudice on our own side, we cannot think so. The Portuguese Minister's arguments reduce themselves to about four of any importance, which are—(1) LOBENGULA's authority is not, or was not, universally recognized throughout the district which he is supposed to have conceded. (2) Portugal has recently made considerable exploring and other expeditions about this district. (3) She has always resisted the claims of other nations. (4) Her own date back to a cession of the Empire of Monomotapa in 1630, itself the outcome and formalizing of a series of conquests extending into the sixteenth century. To the first of these, it can only be replied that no native chief we ever heard of probably had what an English, or even a Portuguese, lawyer would recognize as plenary authority to transfer the allegiance of his so-called subjects, and that this disqualification is quite certain to have weighed as heavily on the Emperor of Monomotapa in the seventeenth century as on LOBENGULA in the nineteenth; to the second, that it is nihil ad rem, Africa having been traversed of late by exploring parties of all kinds and nations; to the third, that even proof that you have always said a thing is yours is not proof that it is yours. As for the Empire of Monomotapa, even if we admit the validity of the cession, and forbear to lay too unkindly stress on the almost confessed absence of any attempt on the Portuguese part to administer the country or build up the well-preserved ruins since, we still have the almost insuperable difficulty of determining what the Empire of Monomotapa was. Senhor BARROS GOMES has not produced the very slightest evidence of its extending either from sea to sea or over the district recently covered by the rival schemes. On the contrary, the best historical atlases, not constructed or published by Englishmen, limit the ancient possessions and conquests of the Portuguese to pretty much the same coast strips as are still recognized, and recognized with considerable generosity, as theirs. That travellers, hunters, ivory-dealers, slave-dealers, of their nation frequently, in the seventeenth and early eighteenth century, if not later, made their way from the Guinea coast to that of Mozambique, or vice versa, is exceedingly probable, or rather quite certain; but this could in no sense give possession.

The simple fact is, of course, that, but for the extension of English enterprise from the Cape northwards, for the lodgments effected by the Germans, and for the formation of the Congo State (against which, by the way, she brought out precisely the same antiquated and invalid claims), Portugal would never have dreamt of making any solid or serious demand to be served heir to the Emperor or Monomotapa, with leave to locate Monomotapa (which unluckily, as every man of letters knows, had become early in the eighteenth century itself a cant word in one European nation, at least, for the land of Nowhere) in any part of Africa which might come handy. As to the well-preserved ruins, HER MAJESTY might just as well—indeed, considerably better—lay claim to Syria and Arabia because she is the representative of Duke ROBERT and King RICHARD, and there are a great many ruined crusading castles from Edessa to Jôf. What the result of this wrangle will be nobody knows. But the best result for the Portuguese would be that they should receive from England an acknowledgment of their title to as deep a strip of the coast land as they can fairly claim, and should in return finally renounce pretensions which, even if Great Britain acknowledged them, they have neither capital, nor energy, nor colonizing and commercial instinct enough to enforce profitably for themselves. As for English statesmen, their duty is simple and clear; it is to keep at all costs a fair-way in the centre of the continent for English expansion northward.

TITHES.

WHATEVER else the Government may attempt next year in the way of legislation, a well-considered and resolute effort must be made to pass a Tithes Bill. It is an extremely troublesome subject to deal with, no doubt. Hitherto every endeavour to dispose of it has ended in failure; and there is no possibility of settling it to the contentment of everybody, or even without additional irritation to some. In that respect, however, it is no more of a nuisance than other lively questions; and as the tithe dispute now stands, it is the disguise of so much political rancour, the instrument of so general a spirit of lawlessness, the occasion of so much suffering, that it must not be allowed to drag on any longer without a determined effort to settle it, regardless of votes. It is now ascertained (and a meeting held this week has shown it more clearly than ever) that no scheme of settlement that can be invented will exclude offence to some considerable body of persons or other; and therefore the right thing to do is to frame and force a plan which, in the first place, shall be most accordant with the principles of common justice, and, in the next, shall content the greater number of those to whom justice is not a matter of indifference.

This, no doubt, is the Government view of the matter. No exhortation need be addressed to that quarter; and it is a pleasure to observe that even since we last wrote on the subject—which is no longer than seven days ago—the prospect of success for a reasonable Tithes Bill has brightened considerably. It is not only in Wales that the trouble works, and not only in Wales that the poorer clergy have suffered extreme privations through the difficulty of collecting tithe. In England they have suffered too, and that in a measure which the general public has little notion of, though much of their well-concealed misery has been dragged to light in the clerical journals. But the difficulty of collecting tithe has not been the same in both countries. For by far the most part at any rate, the English clergy have simply fallen under the common misfortune that has impoverished landowners and ruined farmers—the misfortune of a long period of “low prices.” If many an English parson has been brought to the deepest distress through the non-payment of tithe, it is not so much because of unwillingness to pay, but sheer inability. In Wales the whole condition of things has been entirely different. Though the farmers of that country have had some bad years too, “agricultural depression” has weighed upon them far less than on the English farmers—who, it must be confessed, are neither so managing nor so thrifty. It may be much to the credit of the Welshmen, therefore, that they have been better off; but it is not to their credit that, being better off, they have distinguished themselves by withholding tithe in a violent, lawless, and signally cruel way. At this moment the excuse of inability has quite disappeared with a general revival of prosperity; but the Welsh farmers still refuse to pay their debts, still keep that part of their rent called tithe in their pockets, and so bring out into clearer light the more effective motives of refusal. Things must go by their right names; and therefore these motives must be described as excess of thrift (otherwise greed), and Nonconformist hostility passing into rancour under the ferments of political hate. The first of the two motives works out in practice as robbery: robbery with violence when legal process of remedy is resisted. This, when organized, and when inflamed by the second motive, becomes a common danger. It becomes yet more of a danger when leaders of Opposition and other authoritative political persons lend it their favour; and so it is that the tithe conspiracy in Wales is so eminently conspicuous, imperatively calling for treatment not less courageous than discreet.

We may hope with considerable confidence that this it is to have. Yet only a few days ago the difficulties of dealing with it seemed to have increased very sensibly. The conclusion of nearly all impartial persons who have studied the matter is, that nothing can be done without taking the collection of tithe out of the hands of the clergy and ordering its direct payment by the landlord instead of by the tenant-farmer. Lord SELBORNE's volunteer committee—as competent a body of men as could well be brought together—takes that view. The temporary and incomplete measure which was laid before the House of Commons last year was opposed from the Government benches, by and on behalf of tenant-farmers, because this solution was not embodied in it. Now it is understood to have been adopted by the Government for its proposed new measure. Upon all this a conference of landowners was held at Rhyl to consider the question; and immediately afterwards it was reported in the newspapers, and more particularly in the Times, that the meeting had revealed a lamentably obstructive spirit. The landlords, it was said, had shown a violent indisposition to accept the business of collecting the tithe. When a resolution was proposed to the effect that “the passing of an Act dealing with the tithe question in a comprehensive spirit is most urgent,” it came out that “only on one point was there complete unanimity of opinion”—namely, that a Tithe Bill which laid the burden of collection on the Welsh landowners was an impossibility.” The chairman, Sir RICHARD BULKELEY, was reported to have made a vigorous attack on the clergy “which was continued for “the remainder of the proceedings”; and in the end the landlords carried a resolution declaring that the particular requirement of Wales was not a Tithe Bill but a Church Discipline Act! When this account of the meeting appeared in the Welsh newspapers it excited a furious commotion amongst the clergy; when it was reproduced in the Times by one who was present at the Conference, and therefore not likely to be mistaken, the commotion was increased; nobody doubting that in Wales at any rate Conservative landlords were in full revolt against what is universally taken to be the fundamental principle of the Government Bill. Little by little, however, we have since learnt that these reports of the Conference proceedings were singularly erroneous. The Correspondent's statements have been contradicted all round. He referred to Mr. P. PENNANT as amongst the selfish and obstructive. This gentleman declares his astonishment at the Times romance; averring more particularly that, “with two exceptions, “I believe the whole Conference was unanimous in “the opinion that the tithe rent-charge should be paid “directly by the owner.” Sir RICHARD BULKELEY, the chairman of the Conference, expresses an equal amazement. To the best of his recollection, “only one speaker said he “thought that transferring the onus from tenant to landlord “might cause friction between them.” Sir RICHARD has not set his face against the transference, and, indeed, has himself offered to relet farms to present tenants on the understanding that he paid the tithe. Neither did he make an onslaught against the Church, or the clergy generally; though it seems that he did point to cases in which the Church has been disgraced by particular irregularity and neglect, and he wishes there were speedier and simpler means of purging out the offenders. To this all good Churchmen, and all good men of every denomination, will say Amen; and there is an end of the matter. The fact appears to be that two or three mischievous persons—if indeed there was more than one—chose, for purposes best known to themselves (and not likely to go further) to put about a scandalously incorrect account of what passed at the Rhyl Conference. It was unfortunately accepted as accurate; and for a while it really seemed as if the Welsh landlords deserved the reproach that was levelled at them from every parsonage in the Principality. Evidently it was all a mistake, to put the mildest explanation on the reports of "Our Welsh Correspondent"; and the mistake being cleared up, it is in the nature of things that squire and parson should proceed in this and other matters upon a more friendly footing even than before. What may have been intended by those who raised the storm, or whether they meant anything more than to be busy, we are still left to guess. But the storm will clear the air—has cleared the air; and, whereas it did seem likely enough while it was raging that the Welsh landowners had gone astray, misled by extremely false notions of self-interest, now we have a pretty full assurance that the only safe means of relieving Wales from a great torment and a gross scandal will not be opposed by them.

PROCESSES IN BOOK ILLUSTRATION.

THERE is no doubt that artists, or at least many artists, prefer "processes" to engravings of all kinds, in the illustration of books. Their motive is obvious. A wood-engraver necessarily fails to reach absolute exactness; he "cuts away" something delicate, and the artist is annoyed. His work is no longer his own. For this the remedy exists. Draw for the wood as the wood should be drawn for, in a strong and simple style. This was the manner of DÜRER, and we are daring enough to prefer DÜRER's manner to that of the modern book-illustrators. If it is desired to draw in a different way, though we still prefer the best woodcutting to process work, wood becomes no longer the proper material. It can produce work as delicate as Mr. WHYMPER's copy of ROBERT WILSON's contemporary drawing of JOHN BUNYAN (in Dr. BROWN's Biography); but wood-engraving is not encouraged to reach these heights. It is being killed by processes. The artist rejoices; for here, by dint of photography, he has what he thinks an exact reproduction of his design. We are not so unkind as to agree with him. He ought to know; it seems absurd for the amateur to offer a contrary opinion, yet we are surprised to find artists so easily contented. If they draw in pen and ink, they have less reason to grumble than if they use washes. Thus, in Mr. ABBEY's designs for She Stoops to Conquer, the drawings are, undeniably, reproduced with great accuracy and effect. We may think that the copies have a scratchiness absent in the originals—that is matter of opinion. But a book like that is extremely expensive. The very best paper, the most careful printing, are needed. It is when processing of pen and ink is "democratic," is executed on cheap paper, that the results are less enjoyable. But it may be argued that on cheap paper woodcuts would print no better; and this may be true. The real difficulty arises when washes are used. The artist makes his drawing on a much larger scale than the processed reproduction. Consequently "passages," which may be all very well in the original drawing, come out in the printed book as distressing amorphous blotches of black. Open any book illustrated in this wise, and the odds are that you are confronted with the crude and shapeless "blotisque." For example, on the first page of a new story we find a small boy gazing through a gate, on which a beast of stone—probably a lion—is frowning. Behind this animal the shade is indicated by lumps of ragged black, with about as much gradation as that which is commonly applied to boots. On the frontispiece an elderly man in shirtsleeves is kissing a girl under a tree. Behind her is a shell full of ink exploding. Or, perhaps, it is a black cuttlefish, which, unlike the mailed turtle, "claps her broad wings" and claims the equal skies." There is no form, nothing but splashes of black, in this shade. We are not blaming the artist whose drawing, for all we know, may have been very effective; but these are the results which the process gives. Again, there is a most distressing plaid-like texture in this kind of work, a texture uniform in the spacing of its chequers, and only gradated in depth of darkness. We find in books masses of what, we presume, is foliage, tinted exactly as black as a well-polished boot. Defects like this occur even in such French work as the illustrations to M. PIERRE LOTI's Madame Chrysanthème, though not to such a distressing extent. And the problem arises: How is it possible for the artists to regard such ill-distributed masses of blotch and such dismal plaid textures as representative of their own drawings? They seem to be well pleased; and, if the public is also pleased, while nobody but the disconsolate amateur is vexed beyond his patience, there is plainly not much use in protesting. A child with hair left in white, with a dark shepherd tartan face, and two black currants for eyes, may be an agreeable object in the opinion of the majority. There is no help for it, unless publishers will take pity on the remnant who have not bowed the knee to the BAAL of Processes, and will publish a small edition of any readable book without any illustrations at all. When the outline of a woman's arm is presented as a black, thick, woolly, smudged, irregular line on one side, dwindling into unoutlined plaid pattern on the other, the interest in the heroine who owns the arm evaporates. It is not fair on the heroine! Possibly the "process" may be improved; perhaps it is only in its infancy; at present it often reduces designs, whatever their actual merit, to the very decrepitude of art. Possibly methods which are legitimate enough in brushwork must necessarily become hideous deformities when reduced and photographed through some kind of fine network. But, whatever guesses we may make, and however processes may be improved, nothing will explain how artists come to be satisfied at present with such deplorable caricatures of their own performances. Art and machinery, we think, are necessarily antagonistic—at least, as a rule—and when processes have killed engraving, perhaps the world will awake to lament a lost art, and to censure fallacious mechanical reproductions. Meanwhile, we presume, engravers are starving—a pleasant, economical makeweight to the delights of shapeless blots of black and specimens of plaid pattern. Compare any processed book with WALKER's initial letters to Philip, with LAWLESS's, or Mr. SANDYS's, or Mr. TENNIEL's drawings, in the old Once a Week, and the decline will seem, not fall, but catastrophe. Meanwhile we are not criticizing the merits of the artists' original designs, but merely the way in which "processes" libel and caricature them.

THE FIGHT WITH THE TRADES-UNIONS.

THE prospect of the threatened strike among the gas-workers has materially improved during the week. It appears much more likely than it did that this most deliberate and unjustifiable strike will be beaten, and well beaten, and quickly beaten—which will be an excellent thing for the community at large, in the first place, and ultimately for the whole body of workmen themselves. Nothing in the considerable mass of talk and writing on this subject which has appeared since we gave our opinion on the tyranny of the Trades-Union Committees last week has been of a nature to modify the view we then expressed; but it does look as if the reaction we foresaw to be inevitable is coming rather sooner than had appeared likely. It is at least very probable that certain elementary facts are making their way steadily into general comprehension. One of them is that the Trades-Union Committees are fighting for their own hand exclusively, and that by means of misrepresentation, personalities, vulgar swagger, and intimidation. The decidedly riotous proceedings at Peckham Rye last Sunday have done something to spread that truth. Friends of the people who knock down and brutally kick "respectable-looking" elderly workmen for saying that a certain sum is not bad pay have put their blackguardism beyond dispute. When further it appears that 2½d. a ton amounts to three or four pounds a week, it becomes equally clear that there is no shadow of right to public sympathy on the part of the coal-workers. They, at least, are not in the position of the dockers. The discovery that the Gas-Workers Union was saying the thing that is not when it said that the thousand workmen who accepted the South Metropolitan Company's terms afterwards repented of the acceptance, and that the Coal-

Porters were also inaccurate when they asserted that all the employers in their trade had accepted the terms demanded in the meeting of last August, has done something to "enlighten the public conscience." Another fact has involuntarily been demonstrated by Mr. STOPFORD BROOKE in the course of his exertions on behalf of the strikers at Silvertown. It is this—that highly-strung emotional persons of loquacious piety hold that their services in the cause of the poor (considered at a comfortable distance, as an excuse for raising subscriptions and as raw material for rhetoric) entitle them to dispense with all regard for accuracy, charity, and fairness in dealing with individual employers. A third fact, of even more importance than these two, has been demonstrated at Silvertown and at Manchester. It is that the brag countenance of Trades-Union Committees is apt to grow very long when they are faced with a little courage. They soon begin to whine, as the Manchester Committee are doing, over the hardness of heart of ratepayers who will not help them to bully the Town Council. Finally, the most important fact of all has been well rubbed into the public by the insolent bullying of Messrs. MARK HUTCHINS and his brother "executives." It is that the safety and comfort of Londoners will be at the mercy of a handful of fussy wire-pullers, if the Gas-Workers and the Coal-Porters Union have their way. Therefore, being enlightened in its conscience, shocked in its morality, spirited up in its courage, and scared for its comfort, the public may possibly stiffen its backbone, and give the "executives" a lesson.

The first results of this improvement in general tone in London are the revival of common sense in Scotland Yard and the revival of courage among the workmen. The authorities at the head of the police do really seem since Monday to have gone back to the old theory that the duty of the force is to protect all men and not only those whose votes may turn out to be useful to the Home Secretary, and to prevent riot, not to wait for it. Somebody, or something, has made them understand that the Committee, which has got some thousands of men under its control so completely that it can make them, though working at widely separate places, "down tools" at the word of command, when the downing of tools is illegal, requires watching when it is engaged in forcing on a strike and is using threatening language. The measures which ought to have been taken to protect the Dock Companies, and the men they did contrive to secure, have been taken to protect the South Metropolitan Gas Company. Police have been sent to protect their works inside and out. It may be that the force will not be needed, for the strike leaders have arranged with the managers that the outgoing men shall evacuate the works in such a way as to avoid any contact with those who are coming to take their places. In this the Union Committee has shown a commendable spirit—the only pity is that the display should have been delayed till after the arrival of the police. More hopeful even than the rather tardy awakening of Scotland Yard is the manifest revolt of a large portion of the workmen against the dictation of the Committees. The thousand who had agreed to the Company's favourable terms have stood by their contract, and it is now known that there will be no difficulty in replacing those who have been called out by the Union. The Company has easily secured as many men as it wants. At Woolwich, too, the gas-workers who had gone out on strike have found their places filled up with ease. It is obvious that, as long as men willing to work are protected, no difficulty will be found in securing gas-workers, even without having recourse to the extreme measure of lending soldiers to the Companies, which is not a thing to be lightly done, for many reasons. There is, in fact, no strike at all, in the proper sense of the word. A certain number of gas-workers have left their employment, and have been replaced by others; but that is not a strike. What there might have been, what there may be yet if the police or the Company lose their nerve, is an attempt on the part of certain wirepullers, supported by a misled mob, to interfere with the freedom of employers and workmen alike. That is quite another thing. It is simply an abuse of power which it is the duty of the State to suppress. It is not the less its duty because the attack is directed against a private Company, and not against the Corporation, as is the case at Manchester. The firmness of the employers, the men who support them, and the police has its natural counterpart in the obvious confusion among the leaders of the Union. The refusal of Mr. HUTCHINS and his fellow-committeemen to allow their particular fight to be managed by outsiders, for their own honour and glory, is something more than an example of the unwillingness of British working-men to follow leaders of their own class. It is a proof of the desire of working-men leaders to keep whatever honour and glory may be obtainable to themselves. Also it is a sign of the little belief they have in the honesty one of another. Messrs. BURNS, MANN, and TILLET must find a disagreeable difference between the rather fulsome adulation of the LORD MAYOR and the conciliatory gentlemen at the Mansion House and the rude language of their brother sons of toil. Nor will the gas-workers in all probability benefit [much by the help of the coal-porters. This body of workmen has just made a good arrangement for itself, and, though it may brag about what it will do to the South Metropolitan Gas Company, we shall wait to see what comes of the bragging before deciding that it is to be anything serious. The leaders of the coal-porters and their allies are not wholly ignorant of facts. They know that the burden of a strike would fall first and heaviest on their own class, which is far more dependent on gas and the power of obtaining coal in small quantities than any other. For that reason alone they would find it difficult to secure general obedience. The lightermen, too, are clearly of opinion that they have struck often enough, and would risk too much by striking again.

It is thought right, we see, to talk of this dispute as a disaster, and to lament that extreme measures were not avoided. This language is more creditable to the heart than the head of the persons who use it. No doubt it would be better if all mankind were wise and temperate; but they are not. Too often, as every copybook knows, they do not do the right thing till they are driven to it by disagreeable experience. The trades-unions are distinctly in want of a lesson as to the road they should take, and this is as good a time to give them one as another. Therefore, we think that the challenge they have issued should be accepted, and the fight fought out. It is, no doubt, true, as LORD MONKSWELL (who seems candidly surprised that a trades-union can be unreasonable) has pointed out, that these bodies have helped by their interference to convince employers that it will be for their own interest to treat their workmen handsomely. If the unions had not threatened to become tyrannical, the employers might not have come to see that they would gain by standing to their workmen on more humane relations than the mere exchange of wages for work. This may be counted to them for righteousness; but now that the lesson has been taught and learnt, now that employers are beginning to offer fixed engagements, and a share of profits for prolonged service and good work, the unions are not to be excused if they attempt to prevent men from obtaining the boon simply because it may diminish, or even remove, the need for their own organization. That would be a piece of noxious tyranny, and should be fought with every legitimate weapon.

PROVINCIAL MUSEUMS.

IN connexion with the chance which has thrown into the hands of the WHITWORTH Trustees something like 150,000*l.* to expend on the foundation and arrangement of an Art Gallery for Manchester, a pamphlet has been issued by "A Manchester Man" (CORNISH: Manchester), which is very well worth the attention of those whom it may concern, both in that city and elsewhere. The dangers of such a sudden influx of wealth may be said in the particular circumstances to be almost equal to the difficulties of no wealth at all. And as the fashion of such benefactions (call them ransom or what you will) appears to have set in, it is particularly desirable that some general idea of what is best to be done with them should set in likewise. "A Manchester Man" by surveying what has been done, and giving some hints as to what should be done, has done good service to a cause which almost all men of brains and cultivation, whatever may be their opinions on politics, religion, education, social progress, and all the rest of it, must have at heart. Whatever is disputably good, it is indisputably good that there should be within immediate reach of every dweller in an almost necessarily unlovely manufacturing town, and within not very distant reach of every dweller in its neighbourhood, a collection of beautiful things. In such a collection it may be said that there is hardly any possible evil. You may look too much on the wine when it is red, no doubt, and you may "turn," as Mr. BROWNING says, "to yonder girl that fords the 'burn,' with results distressing to the moralist. It is said that you may read too much, which, though we should be slow to believe it, we are prepared to admit as possible. But we do not believe that there is a proved case of any one going to the dogs from too much frequenting of galleries. The "Manchester Man" sketches pleasantly enough the various stages of museums—the odds-and-ends stage, the stage of an imposing building, Gothic, Palladian, or what not, as the case may be, constructed with a view to anything but the contemplation of its contents—and the more ambitious stage of recent times, when a generous emulation has tempted some local persons to buy at fancy prices examples of contemporary or other art which happened to be fashionable or to appeal to their own tastes. It is no wonder that he decides that all ought to depend, and that all does depend, on the director, or that (with some well-deserved praise to Cambridge) he selects Dublin as the type of the happy museum which has got the right director. That Mr. HENRY DOYLE should be taken and cut up into little stars for the benefit of all places requiring such persons is a truth now perfectly well known among all persons who possess connaissance de cause. But it has, perhaps, not been so generally realized that the essence of Mr. DOYLE's success lies in the fact that, small as his resources are, he has been allowed his own way, and has been permitted to buy when he likes and to save when he likes. A large sum of money at command, with generous local patrons of art anxious to fill the gallery and earn themselves a name, does not, we fear, suggest a similar success as immediately probable. But the "Manchester Man" (whose only fault is that he quotes Sir J. C. ROBINSON too much) points out ways in which a good deal may be done while waiting for good hap at auctions. And we should add ourselves to what he says that still more may be done by cultivating the unfashionable. The great difference between a committee of amateurs and a director who knows what he is about (unless he is also a man with a mania) is that the first are almost certain to go in for fashion and the second is not. And, immense as has been the dead-lift in prices of works of art during the last generation, every student of picture sales knows that fashion has still very much to do with it. To every buyer for a museum of limited, or even of large, resources which comes late into the field the two golden words are "Bide your time" and "Buy what other people are not buying." That is what a local committee can, in most cases, be very hardly induced to do. Meanwhile galleries of really intelligent structure and arrangement can be got ready, series of casts and photographs and photogravures can be arranged, all manner of infinitely useful but exceedingly inexpensive work can be done. The process may not be exciting, like the giving of big commissions and the drawing of big cheques. The selection of the director (though there are now far more competent men at disposal than there were not long ago) may not be easy. But by taking this course many provincial towns besides Manchester may hope, though perhaps not on so great a scale, soon to have a chance of laying something like a solid foundation on which a more and more useful superstructure can be gradually built. By taking the other plan an excellent way of achieving "folies" is afforded. The gallery "folly" may be briefly described. At the beginning it costs some thousands, and is admiringly described in all sorts of paragraphs and articles; but the latter end thereof sometimes ought to be a curtain tightly drawn, and is too often astonishment, if not hissing.

THE FRENCH DEPUTIES.

THE Chamber of Deputies has been clearing the way for whatever work it may do after the Christmas holidays by preliminary labours of a kind fortunately unknown to the English Parliaments of this generation. It has been deciding on contesting elections, and has been discharging this duty much as the House of Commons did in the times of Sir ROBERT WALPOLE. This our readers know to be another way of saying that it has been giving its decisions with a strict regard to politics and no regard whatever to evidence. The rule it follows is quite intelligible, and was, in fact, our own in days before the House of Commons wisely handed a kind of work it habitually did with gross partiality over to the judges. The majority of the Chamber is Republican (for which, merely for purposes of comparison, read Whig), and the rule of its conduct imposes itself at once. When the member whose election is disputed is a Republican (Whig), he is uniformly declared duly returned, even if his majority is only of ten votes. When he is reactionary (read Tory), his election is found to have been vitiated in some way or another, even though he had a majority of a thousand. A pretext, of course, must be found, and accordingly one is forthcoming. It is the intervention of the clergy. Whenever a curé can be shown to have even hinted that he would be glad to hear of the return of the Conservative it is enough. The election is at once declared void, and it is seldom difficult to find that the curés were in favour of the Conservatives. The Chamber has no objection to the intervention of the clergy in elections, provided it is made on the right side. It loudly applauded the Republican clergy in Corsica, who exerted themselves to promote the return of M. ARÈNE. It then proceeded to unseat a Corsican reactionary returned by a neighbouring constituency because some of the clergy of his district, who were not Republicans, did for him what had just been declared to be admirable when done for M. ARÈNE. There is certainly one respect in which the French Chamber of Deputies of to-day copies the English Parliaments of the eighteenth century with striking fidelity, and even betters their instruction.

The decision the Chamber would give on the return of General BOULANGER could not be doubtful. It was undeniable that the votes given for him were thrown away. He was at the time of the election, and is now, under sentence by a Court which may have been formed for political purposes, but was unquestionably duly constituted. He had been condemned to imprisonment for life and deprivation of civil rights. Therefore he could not be a candidate, and was thus, in theory, if not in fact, in much the same position as Mr. JEREMIAH DONOVAN, who calls himself O'DONOVAN ROSSA, when he too was elected to the House of Commons. Whether, if he was not elected, his opponent, M. JOFFRIN, was, seemed not equally clear. But, as M. JOFFRIN received the necessary proportion of votes, the Chamber took a strictly legal course in declaring him duly returned. The debate to which the vote gave rise did not even profess to deal with it as a legal question. On both sides what was argued was, not the technical legality or illegality of the voting, but the virtues of Boulangism and the sins of the Parliamentary Republic. If it appears excessive to say that there was argument in the case, then let it be put that there was a great deal of assertion and counter-assertion. The scene in the Chamber, which for the rest fell below expectation, could not alter the General's position, or leave him less free to deliver his promised course of lectures on Boulangism in the United States. M. CLÉMENCEAU's opposition to the return of M. JOFFRIN is only one more proof of how little the Radical leaders can sometimes love one another. The spirit which the Chamber has displayed throughout its examination of the returns promises well for Boulangism. It has been made very clear that the Radicals, though diminished in numbers, are still as much as ever masters of the Opportunists. All the promised moderation and fairness towards the Conservatives disappeared as the majority warmed to its work. Every pretence of conciliation was given up, and those Conservatives who had shown themselves willing to co-operate with a Moderate Republican Ministry have been rudely assured that no compromise is possible. The old rabid hatred of the clergy has broken out as strongly as ever. It has been shown that the new Chamber is much what the old was, and may be expected to behave as it did. The discovery causes us no surprise. When the Chambers meet we expect to see the old dreary round of unstable Ministries, angry wrangling, and financial mismanagement begin again, and we shall be greatly surprised if our expectation is not fulfilled.

SIR FREDERICK LEIGHTON'S SPEECH.

THE students of the Royal Academy are to be complimented on the opportunity offered them of benefiting by the encyclopædic knowledge of their President. It has been made a reproach to such as draw and paint, that though they do not always know how to do these things, they never know anything else. Sir FREDERICK LEIGHTON is a standing answer to this unmannerly jape; for not only does he know how to paint and draw, but he knows nearly everything else. Spanish history is not a subject frequently studied in this country, and the President of the Royal Academy is not officially bound to know anything about it at all. Yet Sir FREDERICK LEIGHTON before coming to Spanish art, which may be said to be his own field, exhausted the philosophy of Spanish history. He sent his students away with clear ideas as to the exact share Celtiberians, Iberians, Carthaginians, Romans, Visigoths, Franks, Arabs, Moors, and several other peoples had in forming the Spaniard. Only want of space can have prevented him from discussing the curious questions connected with the Alan settlement in Galicia, the influence of the Jew, or the precise share of the gipsy in the formation of the Spanish people. He was so accurate that he carefully called ZURBARAN an Estremeño. We hope he did not puzzle his attentive hearers, and we admire the accuracy of the reporters, who were not a bit bothered by the President's tildes, or by the "cs," "js," and "zs," which he, no doubt, pronounced with unsparing precision. The President has even read QUEVEDO, and quotes him as if it was nothing.

On the whole, it is a pity that Sir FREDERICK LEIGHTON spent so much time over the formation of the Spanish race before he came to Spanish art, and the very sound criticism he had to give his hearers about it. We could have spared much of his—to be frank—rather superficial, and necessarily second-hand, remarks on history, for the sake of a little more about the Gothic cathedrals, ZURBARAN and VELAZQUEZ. A little more about the influence of Moorish art (with a word or two about the Arab—a very different person) might have been exchanged for his egregious statement touching the Carthaginian strain in the Catalans. We are furiously afraid that this piece of information indicates the existence of very vague notions in the President's mind as to the exact nature of the Carthaginian power in Spain or elsewhere. If he is looking about for the ancient ancestors of the Catalans, we commend the Greek colony of Ampurias to his attention. Where does the Greek come out in the Catalan? When the President gets to art on his way down from the creation of the world, there is no more of this sloppy, though harmonious, talk. We could wish that he had not dismissed STIRLING MAXWELL quite so airily, nor accused FORD of overrating the Spaniards; but the President's own judgments were right enough. It is very true, as he says in his own eloquent way, that the Spanish genius in art and in literature is strong, and individual, and subtle, but terribly narrow. No critic can overlook the mark it made by mere dint of being so intensely national; but it had small power to originate and little power to teach. What it took from the foreigner it made its own, and it gave very little back. The mould of one kind of prose story, a handful of plots for comedies, some stage effects, make up its contribution to the literature of its neighbours. The two first-rate men Spain produced were Spanish enough no doubt, but they had no predecessors and they left no school. CERVANTES and VELAZQUEZ have had an immense influence, out of their own country, but it must be attributed to them, and not to their race, which never produced a second to either of them, and has not continued their work. That part of the President's speech which was devoted to VELAZQUEZ was all too short. In these days when his name is taken so frequently, if not in vain, at least very much at random, we should like to hear what a painter who has thought about his art has got to say when he is speaking all his mind on the subject of that famous piece of advice to the student to paint like VELAZQUEZ. Nobody seems to advise the young man to see like VELAZQUEZ; but, if he cannot do that, of what avail will it be to him to imitate brushwork? As yet the advice seems to have borne fruit in the shape of acres of canvas covered with nothing most dexterously painted. They paint the air, those students, and fill one's belly with the east wind. We grieve to have to add that the President wandered away from art at the end and turned aside to platitudes. He found fault with VELAZQUEZ as a man, because he thought too much of royal favour and allowed his duties as Aposentador Mayor to get in the way of his painting. Saving the reverence of the President, this is no better than nonsense. VELAZQUEZ, as a man, was a Spaniard and courtier of the seventeenth century, and lived as others did. What he took from his art for society and his Court duties was only his time after all. At the worst it was better than taking his heart out of it by painting waggon-loads of hasty portraits and ship-loads of potboilers, which is the equivalent error of the modern painter. Of the two, we prefer the mistake of VELAZQUEZ.

HEARINGS IN CAMERA.

THE joint opinion of the ATTORNEY-GENERAL, Mr. DIGBY, and Mr. DODD on the case submitted to them by Mr. GOULD, with reference to the judicial right of holding—or claim to hold—legal proceedings in camera is directly opposed to the recent ruling of Mr. Justice DENMAN in the case of MALAN v. YOUNG. Sir RICHARD WEBSTER and his two colleagues state that they know of no precedent for the exclusion of the members of the Bar or the general public from the hearing in court of such an action as the one in question, and that they are of opinion that, as the law now stands, the learned judge was not legally justified in excluding the general public or Mr. GOULD. At the same time they draw a distinction, as they might be expected to do, between an arbitrary or quasi-arbitrary clearance of the court at the discretion of the presiding judge, and "the exclusion of a particular portion of the public, such as women and children, from trials in which evidence of an indecent character is to be given." This practice rests, they observe, upon "long usage and upon principle" which in no way affects, in their opinion, the present case, and they entertain, therefore, no doubt of its legality or of the power of a judge to decide for himself as to its application.

This, however, is an incidental point. No one has questioned, or is likely to question, the judicial authority to clear a court in the circumstances last mentioned. It is the judge's general and arbitrary authority to do so—an authority claimed in such startling breadth of language by Mr. Justice DENMAN—that the authors of this opinion deny; and we must confess that, on the reason of the thing alone, their view commends itself much more strongly to the lay intelligence than does the dictum of the judge. But the argument from legislation is surely as much against Mr. Justice DENMAN's ruling as the argument from general principles. It is strange that, if such a power as the learned judge has claimed were supposed to be inherent in the judicial office, the Legislature—a Legislature containing quite the customary contingent of experienced lawyers—should have gone out of its way at the time of the passing of the Divorce Act to discuss the very question whether an absolute discretion to hear cases in camera should be conferred on the judge to be appointed under the statute. Parliament declined to grant the power, much, if we recollect rightly, to the dissatisfaction of the first Judge-Ordinary, Mr. Justice CRESSWELL, who, by way of protest, was said to have been chary of employing even the qualified power of exclusion, "resting upon long usage and upon principle," to which the signatories of this opinion refer.

For the present, however, there seems no possibility of obtaining an authoritative declaration of the law on this subject. The ATTORNEY-GENERAL and his two learned brethren hold that the order of Mr. Justice DENMAN under which Mr. GOULD was excluded from the court cannot be questioned by action in the courts or any similar legal proceeding. A judge of the High Court cannot, in their judgment, be sued for words spoken or acts done by him in the discharge of his judicial functions, and the officials who carry out his orders, given in the apparent exercise of these functions, have, in the opinion of counsel, a similar indemnity. No force was imposed upon Mr. GOULD, and he is consequently unable by legal proceedings questioning the punishment inflicted to question indirectly the order of which he complains. On the other hand, we hardly like to suggest that he or some other person holding his views, should, by resistance to a judge's order, compel him to inflict the penalty of a fine, though this, no doubt, would be the most convenient, if also the least decorous, mode of raising the question. There is perhaps, however, some reason to hope that, after what has happened in this case, the course taken by Mr. Justice DENMAN will not be followed by other judges in a similar state of the circumstances. Sufficient doubt will, perhaps, be considered to attach to the power claimed by the Bench, on the hearing of "MALAN v. YOUNG," to disincline a judge in future to assert it; and, in any case, we may expect that a fuller consideration of the question will convince the judicial mind of the inexpediency on public grounds of ordering cases to be heard in camera, for no better reason than that the parties are interested in withholding certain facts from the cognizance of the public. In the case of "MALAN v. YOUNG" the motive was no doubt a respectable one; but we have no security that it will be equally so in other cases. It is surely clear that, if it became habitual with judges to authorize hearings in camera on private grounds, the practice would open the door to the worst abuses. There are, indeed, an indefinite number of cases for which at least one of the litigants would be glad to obtain a private hearing; and if, whenever he finds the other suitor accommodating or indifferent, a judge is to be at liberty to indulge his preference, there would be an end of all the safeguards which the present state of publicity is supposed to, and in a considerable proportion of instances undoubtedly does, provide.

LEAP BEFORE YOU LOOK.

THE consequences of jumping before you come to the stile have seldom been more neatly illustrated than by the case of BURNAND v. The National Press Agency (Limited) and the Society Herald (Limited). Whether the plaintiff's thought of bringing the action was altogether a happy one is a question which he can answer for himself when he has got his damages, or failed to get them. But Mr. BURNAND may conceivably have thought it worth while to stand a moderate shot for the sake of displaying to the world the pleasing vision of Criticism as She is Wrote in some quarters no longer nameless. One short week ago the world was in blissful ignorance of the Society Herald, its tricks and its manners. Even now there is some mystery about its origin and character. Why, for instance, is it "limited"? And what is limited? The circulation? The intelligence of the contributors? The expectations of the readers? Not, apparently, the courage to grapple with the unknown, or even the unknowable. It is whispered that, in the theatrical as in the political world, there are such feelings as hatred and jealousy. No doubt they are very rare. To read a book, or to see a play without any prejudice for or against the author or his work is scarcely human. But a wise man will allow his preconceived opinion to be modified, or even reversed, by experience, and a prudent man will not publish what he thinks until he has something to go upon. You may be perfectly certain, as the Virginian was in Democracy, that "that ass 'from Missouri' will make a bad speech. But you had better let him make it before you tell the world what you think of it, and of him, in the columns of a public journal. Sometimes prophecy may seem safe. It is, in reality, always dangerous. A critic may feel as certain that his pet aversion among the Royal Academicians will have eight bad pictures on the line as that he himself will be dunned for his bills at Christmas. But such sentiments come from below, and should be counteracted by that most difficult kind of scepticism, a refusal to believe the worst. It may be as much a matter of calculation that Mr. A. B. or Mrs. C. D. will write and publish a bad novel in the course of the next twelve months, if they live so long, as that Mr. GOSCHEN's minions will want to collect the Income-tax too soon. But we have heard of the patience of JOB. That long-suffering man said, somewhat viciously, "Oh that mine 'adversary had written a book!" or at least the translators of the Authorized Version make him say so. JOB did not say, "Mine enemy has not yet written a book; but I will 'take my pen, and sit down quickly, and write a slashing 'review of the book which he may be expected to write.' If he had, he would probably have rendered himself liable to the Courts of Uz; and, as he had no stock left to be seized, he might have gone to gaol.

The conductors of the Society Herald had no excuse for supposing that Mr. BURNAND would write a bad play, but they would not give Mr. BURNAND a chance. They rushed into print with a scathing article which appeared on the 5th of February last. "Mr. BURNAND," they said, or their theatrical young man said for them, "Mr. BURNAND has written the libretto; but I cannot 'say that it is very much more cheerful than his dismal 'attempts at wit to be seen weekly in Punch.' Most people have a parrot at home who could do it better than that. 'In fact,' this conscientious writer continued, 'to read the libretto by itself is a thankless and most unpleasant task.' It was so thankless, and so unpleasant, that the critic dispensed himself from the burden of achieving it, and only imagined how unpleasant it would be. For, while the notice of Mr. BURNAND's cantata came out, as we have said, on the 5th of February, the cantata itself only came out on the 7th. This awkward jumble of dates requires to be explained, though the explanation is simplicity itself. The piece was announced for the fourth, but had to be postponed at the last moment for three days. Those three sweet days confused the fatherhood of the critical essay, and proved that it could not have been begotten by an earnest desire to speak the truth according to knowledge. Before you can conscientiously say that "ARTHUR CECIL tried very hard 'to be amusing as PICKWICK, but he did not 'by any means look the part,' you must have at least witnessed the attempt. But at the time when these words were penned, Mr. ARTHUR CECIL had not tried to be amusing as PICKWICK, "very hard" or otherwise. Nor was Mr. RUTLAND BARRINGTON "the best in the cast," or, at least, nobody had the right to say so. "It was possible," in the opinion of the Society Herald, "to laugh at some of 'his antics as well as at some of the dialogue which was put 'into his mouth; but this latter [? Mr. BARRINGTON's 'mouth] was such a contrast to the rest of the book that 'I doubt very much whether Mr. BURNAND wrote it at all." As there had been no performance, there could have been no gag, for gag without a performance would be like the grin without the cat. It was suggested, on behalf of the Society Herald, that this information might have been picked up at rehearsals. But it was not suggested that the critic was present at a rehearsal, or that he had any means of finding out what went on there, and he was not called. Moreover, Mr. BARRINGTON swore that there was no dialogue in his part, and that he did not make up any gag before the third performance. Thus the Society Herald first invented an imaginary state of things and then proceeded to comment upon its own creation in disparagement of Mr. BURNAND.

A clearer case of libel, as against the Society Herald, was never proved. There could be no question of fair comment, for there was nothing to comment on. But perhaps the most scientifically perfect part of the proceedings was the evidence of malice. It is very difficult, if not impossible, to prove that an ordinary criticism is malicious. However spiteful, however perverse, however unfair it may seem, it may nevertheless represent the actual views of the critic. But if a writer spins his reflections out of his own head, if he professes to be dealing with what is not before him and what he has not seen, then a personal attack must be malicious. The only legitimate source of an unfavourable judgment is wanting, and therefore the source must be illegitimate. It is true, and it ought to be mentioned, that the defendants subsequently apologized for having been "caught tripping." They were good enough to add that that was "no uncommon failing among journals." Now, when people admit themselves to have been wrong, the admission is a valuable one. But when they go on to assert that other people are no better than themselves, the assertion is of less interest and importance. In fact, such remarks are apt to be treated as surplusage, as common form, as the kind of thing which must be said for the sake of decency. We should be sorry to think that the Society Herald had many competitors in the business of criticizing plays before they are acted. It is not possible, in this hasty and feverish age, for the dramatic critic of a morning paper to go quietly home and sleep over his impressions, and rise betimes, refreshed by slumber, to put his carefully matured thoughts on paper. He must dash off what he has to say at once, lest the other instructors of mankind should be beforehand with him. Such are the baneful effects of intellectual, or quasi-intellectual, competition. Sound criticism can only be infallibly supplied at intervals of one week. But "the little more, and how much it is, and the little 'less, and what worlds away." Between before and after the difference is one, as the logicians say, not of degree, but of kind. It is an interesting question what would have happened if the incriminated article, having been duly composed and set up, had been kept back till after the cantata was sung. In reality, the judgment on Mr. BURNAND's work would have been no fairer, and the animus would have been just as strong. But the difficulty of proof would have been immeasurably enhanced, especially as Mr. BURNAND, to quote from the apology, "was and is a complete and entire stranger to the conductors of" the Society Herald. It is quite possible, however, to dislike a stranger, especially a successful stranger.

If Mr. BURNAND, or "the gentleman," as the Society Herald quaintly calls him, had accepted the apology offered him, he might have encouraged the idea that such practices as that he complained of involved no pecuniary risk. In the haze which seems to hide the law of libel from the eyes of many journalists there is faintly discernible a lurking suspicion that an apology will always hold a man harmless. The error cannot be too soon or too forcibly corrected. It is for the party aggrieved to say whether he accepts an apology, and for the jury to say what effect should be given to it in estimating damages. An apology is sometimes a necessary part of a defence. It is even a defence in itself. The National Press Agency which has been mulcted in the sum of fifty pounds, has more to say for itself than the Society Herald. The Society Herald admitted having libelled the plaintiff, and paid ten pounds into Court. The amount was very properly held to be ludicrously inadequate; and the Society Herald may well be thankful that the jury did not give Mr. BURNAND swingeing damages. The National Press Agency did nothing except print the article, and fifty pounds is a heavy fine for that offence. There can be no doubt that, having undertaken to print the Society Herald, the Agency is legally responsible for any libels that may appear there. Its responsibility may be less technically justified on the ground that payment is received, and that therefore the Agency profited to some extent by the defamatory attack upon Mr. BURNAND. At the same time, there is a very broad and a very obvious distinction between this case and others which will readily occur. Where, for instance, an article is blasphemous, or improper, or plainly libellous on the face of it, the Agency should decline to have anything to do with it. But here the whole sting of the libel lay in the fact that the cantata had not been produced, and it is rather hard to expect that mere printers would make an inquiry into such a point. Baron HUDDLESTON examined one of the Press Agency's servants rather sharply on the abstract question what a libel is, and this somewhat barren inquiry has been extrajudicially pursued. The stale old maxim, "the greater the truth the greater the libel," has been trotted out once more. No doubt, a libel, if we are to speak by the card, need not necessarily be false. It is equally true that, etymologically, libel means "a little book." One piece of information is about as useful as the other. "Qui hæret in litera, hæret in cortice." In a civil action such as Baron HUDDLESTON was trying the usual and sufficient question, in the absence of privilege, is whether the alleged libel be true or false. It could not be pretended that an account of what had not happened was a true account.

HOLY TAFFY'S PRAYER.

NEVER in the world's history have so many and such awakening sermons been delivered in so short a time on the dangers of bad company as the Gladstonian party have been mutely preaching ever since the summer of 1886. The day when Mr. GLADSTONE first led them into evil courses was, for them, the beginning of a period of steadily progressive humiliation and demoralization, such as is hardly to be matched in any of the records of real life, and must be sought in the imaginative pages of the religious tract. The spectacle of these unfortunate persons dragged at their leader's tail from level to level on the downward path, the sight of the successive severance of link after link of their connexion with political respectability, has been quite painful—so painful, indeed, that we are tempted to wish that, if the sufferings of the victims cannot be shortened, their moral sensibilities might at least be extinguished. Why should Fate thus play, as it were, with their mangled characters as a cat plays with a mouse? Why, if the process of humiliation and demoralization must go on, should not the latter of the two be accelerated? Instead of being continually put to fresh shame by their new allies, and having to pass through a stage of acute discomfort until they become hardened, why not annihilate the pangs of humiliation for ever by demoralizing the patients absolutely at once? It is impossible to help wishing that some overdose of their leader's rhetorical anæsthetics—the Gladstone Pain-Killer, Warranted to give Instant Relief to the most Agonized Conscience—might be accidentally administered to his followers, so that, if they must go on disgracing themselves, they may spare the spectators the uneasiness of observing that it gives them pain.

These, however, are vain aspirations; and, though they happen to have been revived in our minds by a paragraph in a Welsh Gladstonian newspaper, we do not at all mean to say that they are so strongly suggested by many other earlier incidents. We would not for a moment suggest that Mr. GEE, of the Baner, is as disreputable a political friend as Mr. O'BRIEN, of United Ireland, or for a moment deny that the agitation for Disestablishment in Wales is respectability itself, even in spite of its association with the anti-tithe war, as compared with the movement which is supported by the Plan of Campaign. Still, we know that when the nerves are in a high state of tension, a comparatively minute irritant may produce a disproportionately potent effect upon them, and the English Liberals who have been so long on the "operating table" of Parnellism may be in the condition of that hospital patient who bore in silence the amputation of his leg, but shrieked when one of the dressers accidentally pricked him with a pin in adjusting the bandages. Mr. GEE's paragraph in the Baner may be the bandage-pin of the Gladstonians, and though they have submitted stoically to the disgrace of association with fraud, violence, and anarchy in Ireland, it may be that there are some among them who still retain enough of the feeling of reverence and the sense of the ridiculous to suffer acutely from the shame of an alliance with an eminent local leader, Mr. GLADSTONE's right-hand man of the Disestablishment campaign in Wales, who suggests in his newspaper the "desirability of praying 'the Lord for the immediate disestablishment and disendowment of the Established Church.'" One does not really know whether the comical element in this announcement prevails or not over the repulsive—so intimately united, so exquisitely blended are the two. If the smug Pharisaic self-assertion of the appeal disgusts for a moment, the ridiculous vanity of provincialism which inspires it promptly gains the upper hand. If it at first recalls the unlovely images of STIGGINS and CHADBAND, they are almost immediately afterwards displaced by the more sympathetically humorous figures of The Three Tailors of Tooley Street. But, though we can laugh at Mr. GEE and Mr. GEE's readers adding a special petition for Disestablishment to the supplication of the "universal week of prayer," we find it difficult to understand how any member of the Gladstonian party who would still like to think of himself as a man of education, of self-respect, of culture, and of that sort of feeling about sacred things which is revolted by the vulgar irreverences of the tub-thumper—whether in the tub or the newspaper—we cannot, we say, understand how any Gladstonian who would like to think thus of himself can contemplate his permanent association (and it is permanent association that he is in for) with Mr. GEE and the Baner without undergoing an agony of shame and self-contempt.

PRECIOUS STONES.

JONATHAN SWIFT was one of the greatest, and (despite what some rather weak-minded people have said of his misanthropy and the like) one of the wisest of men. But he did not specially show either his greatness or his wisdom in making obvious fun of the Yahoos for their delight in coloured stones. If beauty (and on no theory of beauty is this lacking in your gem), rarity (which is always presumed, if not certain), and withal a curious adaptableness to the display both of the ingenuity of the artist in arrangement and the decoration of the owner in wearing, be not vera cause of preciousness, there is no possibility of a theory of æsthetics. But, though all sensible people love precious stones well, and a few sensible people love them wisely, fewer even than this last number know much about them, or are even acquainted with their vast number and variety. This is partly due, in England at least, first, to the singular ignorance and want of enterprise until very recent years of the average jeweller; and, secondly, to the want of good books on the subject. These latter have been usually either strictly mineralogical treatises, hardly occupied with anything but the scientific aspect of the subject; or else "book-made" collections of anecdote, mostly stale; or, lastly, collections, equally book-made, by jewellers and other non-literary persons, concerned chiefly with the trade side of the matter, and frequently cumbrous in form. On the other hand, until quite recently likewise, the ordinary goldsmith-jeweller of English commerce was, even more than most English tradesmen, a mere seller of things over the counter, with hardly any scientific or artistic knowledge of them. He knew the more ordinary stones by name, and perhaps sufficiently by sight or some rough tests, not to be grossly taken in himself or to take in his customers unwarily. He could give you diamonds, rubies, emeralds, sapphires, garnets, pearls, opals, turquoises, amethysts, topazes, the ordinary stones used for seals, and perhaps an aquamarine and a cat's-eye now and then. But he would have stared if asked for a tourmaline, gasped at the name of zircon, been hard put to it to tell the difference between a spinel and a ruby, and said "Pish!" and "No," and "Not to be expected," if called upon for a chrysoberyl or a peridot. Even moonstones, common enough, and certainly lovely enough, as they are, are quite newcomers in the windows of English shops; and the almandine, the handsomest of all garnets, and classical in the Laureate's verse, actually did not appear—we do not know whether it does now—in the first edition of the great English Dictionary of Dr. Murray and the Clarendon Press.

Now that there is more intelligent interest in the subject, that shops where either specimens or jewellers' examples of rare stones can be bought are not uncommon, and that even the ordinary jewellers have so greatly enlarged their repertoires, it has doubtless dawned on a good number of persons that every green stone that is genuine is not necessarily an emerald, and that a smoky-yellow one may be something more precious than a cairngorm. Not only such persons, however, but better informed ones, will find an exceedingly useful, unpretentious, and concise guide to the subject in a little book just issued by an American expert (Precious Stones. By M. D. Rothschild. London and New York: Putnam's Sons). There are a few misspellings and minor errors about it, and there may be some omissions—for instance, we find no mention of the pretty, if not very valuable, moroxite (illiterate jewellers sometimes spell it morosite), the peculiar green of which—the tint of winter spinach, the outer leaves of savoy cabbage, or some kinds of sea-weed—fills a gap in the chromatic scale of precious-stone colour. It is possible that it may be found by another name here; but such omissions are of no great importance, and it is fair to say that we have also missed moroxite in more pretentious works than Mr. Rothschild's. He begins with some general remarks on the qualities of precious stones, on the fashions of cutting them, on the ways of testing and distinguishing them, and so forth; but soon goes off into a brief catalogue, with notice of the appearance, capabilities, and provenance of most of the stones mentioned from diamonds to quartz. It may be most amusing, and not least profitable, to make a few desultory remarks which suggest themselves on this list.

It is probable that, though the phrase "spinel-ruby" is of old date, fewer ordinary buyers of jewels are aware of the difference between the corundum and spinel classes, not only of ruby, but of other gems, than in the case of any other differences of the kind. The actual difference is very considerable; for, while true corundum, of whatever colour, is almost pure alumina, spinel contains magnesia to the extent of nearly a quarter of its substance, and is much less hard than corundum. Yet it is probable that by far the larger number of stones sold as rubies are red spinels, and that not a few so-called sapphires are sapphirines or blue spinels. As for the emerald, it would be decidedly amusing to submit a scratch lot of jewellers' emeralds to mineralogical tests. Scarcely one would probably be found to be a green corundum, and not many, we suspect, to be the "true" emerald (which, differing therein both from spinel and corundum, is chiefly silica), and the rest green spinels, green tourmalines, green zircons, and Heaven knows what else. But when one passes from actual chemical composition and mineralogical quality to the question of beauty, it must always be very much a matter of individual taste what to prefer. Generally, no doubt, beauty does follow rarity, hardness (though not in the case of true emeralds), and purity of composition; but this is not always so. We have, for instance, known persons not generally considered ill-tasted who held the "balas ruby," or rose-coloured spinel, to be a much more beautiful gem than what is known as the true or pigeon's-blood ruby, and who certainly prefer the blaze of the green sapphire to the softer grass-green of the true emerald. Perhaps there is no greater unanimity than in respect to the ordinary or blue sapphire itself; nor, comparatively abundant as sapphires are, is there any stone in which the true colour is more clearly marked off from the watery shades of the lighter and the inky ones of the darker kind. The context of Dante's immortal line—gives one of the only two things which are like it—the hue of the sky at very early dawn; the other is to be found in certain human eyes. No flower has any such tint.

Two classes of very beautiful stones which have recently much increased in public favour are the cat's-eyes and asterias or star corundums. It is a great pity that the popularity of the former, which justly attaches only to the Ceylon cat's-eyes, or chrysoberyls, and to the much rarer corundum cat's-eyes ("sapphire cat's-eyes," &c.), should have flooded the market with cat's-eye quartz, or Hungarian cat's-eye, which is pretty enough at its best, but far inferior to the harder true kinds. Of the "star" stones, the star topaz is, we think, the rarest, and the star ruby, when it is good, the most beautiful; though few things can be much prettier than a star sapphire. The "star" is, of course, due to impurity or foreign bodies; but the substance of the stone is true corundum of the same composition and hardness as the transparent sapphires of different colours. In all stones which possess this quality of floating light there is a singular charm, whether they be the "star" stones, or cat's-eyes, or the lovely cymophanea "spot-chrysoberyl." Of alexandrite, the green chrysoberyl, which changes to red with artificial light, Mr. Rothschild seems to have a very high opinion; but we do not know that we have ourselves seen any very attractive examples of it. While we are dwelling on this division of stones, it may be worth remarking that the cabochon, or round-headed form of cutting, if it gives less artificial fire, seems to produce better colours than facet-cutting. Everybody, for instance, knows, or ought to know, that carbuncle is merely a garnet cut en cabochon, and a garnet merely a carbuncle cut in facets; yet how much does the carbuncle excel the garnet in beauty?

Very beautiful, again, are the zircons or jacinths:—the latter name having long been familiar to literature, though the former is almost or wholly unknown to it, while "jargon" or "jargoon" (another synonym applied to the white zircons, which not unfrequently do duty for diamonds) is no doubt well known to letters in no very different sense, but hardly as a stone. The green zircon is particularly beautiful. Some people may be ignorant of the ingenious process which Mr. Rothschild describes of manufacturing odontolites, or sham turquoises, out of fossil teeth, and others may disagree with him when he laments that the opal was for many years "under the ban of superstition." As to its beauty (though no gems vary more) there can be no question at all; nothing looks so well in artificial light, and nothing accommodates itself so well to combination with other stones and to fantastic setting; but it is a superstition to talk of superstition. There are some pretty strong-minded people who are suspicious of opals, though they may not extend their suspicions to another object of the "ban," black pearls. To pass on, Mr. Rothschild is doubtless right (unless, as is sometimes done, all the corundums are called by the general name of sapphires) in saying that "no mineral has such a suite of colours as" tourmaline. We have seen extremely interesting sets of rings, with tourmalines of different colours arranged in a similar setting, and some of the shades—especially the smoky browns and brownish reds—are extremely curious and beautiful. Tourmaline trenches on that species—one very popular with the poets, but one to which it may be shrewdly suspected most of those who have used the word have attached no very definite meaning—the "entire and perfect chrysolite." For your chrysolite may be either a yellow tourmaline, or a chrysoberyl, or a true chrysolite—which is much softer than either, and which, as Mr. Rothschild, whom we are here unable to "control," mysteriously remarks, "are brought from Constantinople, but the precise locality where they are found is unknown." Probably it is Sinbad's Valley.

Mr. Rothschild does not often insert things of this kind, but his survey of precious stones is full of legitimate interest.

INFLUENZA.

THE mind of the public is at present somewhat exercised by the fear that ere long we may have this disease in our midst. This apprehension is not altogether without justification. The disease is now widely prevalent in Russia, Germany, and even France, and on many previous occasions when this has been the case our shores have been reached. The time of year would be unfortunate for its advent, especially in view of the weather we have lately experienced. The poison (of whatever nature it may be) which causes the disease selects principally the respiratory tract of mucous membrane for the expenditure of its virulence, and adverse climatic conditions would tend to increase its baleful effect in this direction. The word influenza is simply the Italian for our English substantive influence, a sufficiently vague title for a morbid condition. From the rapidity of its onset, and the large number of individuals almost simultaneously attacked, it is not unreasonable to suppose that it results from a poison floating in the air; and, when we add that its infectious nature is fairly well established, we have prima facie evidence of the presence of our microscopic enemy the bacterium. Until, however, our biological friends can give us more certain information on this point, the exact nature of the materies morbi must be looked upon as doubtful. There is probably no disease to which so few persons are insusceptible; indeed, one half, or even two-thirds, of a community are not unlikely to be affected during the course of a severe visitation of this kind. Hence, although it is far from being a fatal disease—we believe that not more than two per cent. of the cases terminate in death—yet the actual number of those succumbing to it is apt to be very large. Unlike other severe diseases of the zymotic type, it may be said, with an approximation to truth, to kill only the very young and those enfeebled by age or previous disease, particularly if this latter be one affecting the lungs.

Influenza is popularly supposed to be in some way connected with cholera, and to be frequently a forerunner of it, and this opinion was said, though it seems with incomplete correctness, to have the support of Professor Zchekaner, who has had much experience of both diseases in Russia. It is difficult to understand how any such connexion can exist, unless it be assumed that there are certain atmospheric conditions which are favourable to the development of both. Even this is quite hypothetical, as influenza may appear at any period of the year or in any weather. Whatever may be the truth in this matter as regards Russia, we see no reason to fear that, should the epidemic reach England, it would be followed here by one of cholera. The symptoms of influenza are clearly defined, and have been recognized for some hundreds of years. Two marked characteristics of it may here be noted: 1, that the amount of prostration in those suffering from it is much greater than the local troubles seem to warrant; 2, the suddenness with which those who become the subjects of it are struck down—this is so notable a feature of the disease that in France it is called "la grippe," and in Germany "blitz-catarrh." The last serious epidemic occurred in this country in 1847. The period over which it is prevalent is happily pretty sharply limited to about six weeks. Animals as well as human beings are liable to suffer from it, and hence, perhaps, the popular saying has arisen that, "if the cat has a cold, it will go through the house." Should influenza make its appearance among us, the best advice we can give those of our readers who may be attacked by it is to go to bed and send for the doctor.

THE GONDOLIERS.

RUDDIGORE certainly suggested that Mr. Gilbert had exhausted the resources of what it has become the fashion to call topsyturveydom so far as his powers of invention were concerned. The Yeomen of the Guard was a new departure, and it was supposed that it had been made for the reason that Mr. Gilbert had come to the end of his tether in the other direction; but either the supposition did injustice to his faculties of imagination, or else rest has restored him, for in The Gondoliers he is almost, if not quite, at his best, and the realm again is that of topsyturvey. The idea—an excellent one for the purpose—would have made a capital Bab Ballad. We do not know whether any one will have Pinafore recalled to his mind, for in that legend two children were changed at nurse, and here are two children whose nurse's ambition causes a mystery; but there is practically no real resemblance between the two stories, for neither Marco nor Giuseppe Palmieri is, in truth, the missing King of Barataria, though for a time it is believed that one of them is the rightful heir. Plots are often good in proportion to their simplicity, a circumstance on which we have previously dilated. If a story cannot be described in some half a dozen lines, it has intricacies which are likely to perplex on the stage in representation as they perplex in narrative. The story of The Gondoliers may be very briefly summarized. One of the two, Marco or Giuseppe Palmieri, is believed to be heir to Barataria; they have both married; but if either is king, he was married in infancy to some one else; so that there are two husbands and three wives, and mystery attaches to the problem who is at once king and bigamist. A very neat end is however provided, for it appears that the King of Barataria is quite another person, and that he has long been devotedly attached to the girl to whom he was wedded at the age of six months. This is the main story, the clever satire of a Monarchy tempered with Republican Equality being incidental. The verse which describes this form of government would be well worth quoting, but that Mr. Gilbert, who is so rarely slipshod, does not seem able to find a rhyme for "equality," and repeats the word. The fault of the dialogue, regarded from the popular point of view, is its supersubtlety: what seems simplicity to the keen, logical brain of the humorist, is over the heads of the average listener, or at least is not to be grasped without thought. This fault is not common in the new book, but it occurs. Thus, for example, Casilda, daughter of the Duke of Plaza-Toro, an impecunious hidalgo who is being made into a limited company, loves her father's "suite," his drummer Luiz, the sole attendant on the impoverished Duke. Casilda learns that she was married in infancy to the Prince of Barataria, and, as he lives, Luiz and she must part. "Henceforth," she says, "my life is another's." The dialogue continues:—

LUIZ. But stay—the present and the future—they are another's; but the past—that at least is ours, and none can take it from us. As we may revel in naught else, let us revel in that!

CAS. I don't think I grasp your meaning.

LUIZ. Yet it is logical enough. You say you cease to love me?

CAS. (demurely) I say I may not love you.

LUIZ. But you do not say you did not love me?

CAS. I loved you with a frenzy that words are powerless to express—and that but ten brief minutes since.

LUIZ. Exactly. My own—that is, until ten minutes since, my own—my lately loved, my recently adored—tell me that until, say a quarter of an hour ago, I was all in all to thee! (Embracing her.)

CAS. I see your idea. It's ingenious, but don't do that. (Releasing herself.)

LUIZ. There can be no harm in revelling in the past.

CAS. None whatever, but an embrace cannot be taken to act retrospectively.

LUIZ. Perhaps not!

CAS. We may recollect an embrace—I recollect many—but we must not repeat them.

LUIZ. Then let us recollect a few! (A moment's pause, as they recollect, then both heave a deep sigh.)

LUIZ. Ah, Casilda, you were to me as the sun is to the earth!

CAS. A quarter of an hour ago?

LUIZ. About that.

CAS. And to think that, but for this miserable discovery, you would have been my own for life!

LUIZ. Through life to death—a quarter of an hour ago!

CAS. How greedily my thirsty ears would have drunk the golden melody of those sweet words a quarter—well it's now about twenty minutes since. (Looking at her watch.)

LUIZ. About that. In such a matter one cannot be too precise.

It is very funny, and, when read, is simple enough; but a considerable proportion of a general audience does not at once comprehend such dialogue, and so a whimsicality characteristic of Mr. Gilbert's peculiar humour does not receive its deserts. He is not incapable of falling into the other extreme; for the Duke's confessions of cowardice are too plain and simple-minded; but there is much real humour in the writing, and, as a rule, a very careful avoidance of what is trivial and unworthy—we do not remember that a pun vulgarizes any part of the book. The verse, too, is frequently poetical, and it is charming to note the manner in which Sir Arthur Sullivan enters into the spirit of the lines. The Gondoliers' duet, "We're called Gondolieri," is light and gay, until a reference is made in the course of it to vespers and vigils and serenades, and then a shade of sentiment is cunningly suggested in the score by other means than a simple piano. The book is worth reading; though, with one or two exceptions, such as that quoted, the dialogue must be heard in the manner intended by the author—spoken on the stage—in order to be fully appreciated. Mr. Gilbert, as a rule, possesses the gift which is so valuable to a dramatist, of perceiving the effect that his words will make—it is only when the supersubtlety of which we have spoken in some of his other books comes to the surface that he loses for a moment his grip of the audience. The good ideas are discreetly handled and not overdone. The fantastic notion of turning the Duke of Plaza-Toro into a limited company is a case in point. A few sentences spring from the announcement. The daughter trusts that she may never be called upon at any time to witness her honoured sire in process of liquidation; and her mother admits that, "if your father stops, it will of course be necessary to wind him up." Otherwise little is heard of the Duke in his novel capacity until the excellent satire of the song in which Duke and Duchess describe the nature of the functions they fulfil, the Duke explaining how he secures honours to satisfy cheap ambition, advertises "ready made" tailors at whose manufacture she admits that Robinson Crusoe would jib; while part of the Duchess's confession runs:

I write letters blatant
On medicines patent
And use any other you mustn't.
And vow my complexion
Derives its perfection
From somebody's soap—which it doesn't.

"It certainly doesn't!" the Duke quaintly echoes. The ladies who at once advertise themselves and soap are so familiar, and the business is so obvious and absurd, that it is a wonder satirists have had nothing effective to say hitherto.

Sir Arthur's music is unfailingly melodious, and the freshness of it, considering that this is his tenth opera, is quite extraordinary. Only very rarely indeed do we catch a faint echo of his own work in previous scores (at times we do so, it is true, but we will not quote and perhaps strain examples); still more rarely is there a suggestion of the work of any other musician, except when he purposely imitates—always with taste and gracefulness—the manner of a school. One of the most remarkable and delightful features in the score is its variety. Sir Arthur has a marvellous aptitude for fitting his music to the occasion, and can be gay or tender with equal ease and appropriateness, while he has always struck us as the one composer of the day, at any rate the one English composer, who can extract genuine humour from an orchestra. The long opening number is full of melody, and the Duke's entry with drum obbligato is not to be heard with a grave face. The song of the Duke, allegro marziale, is without special value; but the ballad for Luiz is a little gem. In several respects the Savoy operas are far superior to any contemporary work of the sort, and this ballad furnishes an example. Mr. Gilbert has adopted the style of the seventeenth-century poet—though for some reason he has chosen to date the opera at a later period, 1750—and Sir Arthur has entered into the spirit of the words with wonderful feeling and refinement. Such work is, it may be feared, wasted on many hearers, but it will be cordially appreciated by those who have perception. Tessa's song, "When a merry maiden marries," is again an instance of sympathetic expression. It is bright, with just a touch of sentiment; while Gianetta's air, "Kind sir, you cannot have the heart our lives to part," is equally charming, though in some respects the reverse of Tessa's song in treatment—sentiment slightly predominates, but there is a light undercurrent of humour. So we come to the quartet, "Then one of us will be a Queen," a burst of unmitigated joyousness and fun, and surely the fortunate circumstance that Miss Jessie Bond was to be the representative of Tessa must have been in the writers' heads when the number was set down. Once more we find the happy blending of sentiment and the gentlest humour in the verses, with the beautiful refrain of "O my darling, O my pet," which the brides sing to their departing lords. And we have spoken of the melody and significance of the music without mentioning one of its chief sources of fascination—the instrumental scoring, full of grace, fancy, and suggestiveness. The horns have a deal to do that is always curiously effective; the other brass instruments are very seldom employed; but the wood wind is constantly called into requisition; and the writing for flute, clarinet, oboe, and bassoon will remain a model of what can be accomplished when perfect taste is united to a thorough mastery of orchestral resource. Passing on to the second act, we would direct the special attention of the hearer, if he be a musician, to the accompaniment of the tenor song, "Take a pair of sparkling eyes," a captivating melody in G flat major, six-eight time, the rhythm recalling the circumstance that Marco has been a gondolier, and so acquainted with barcarolles. The chords are exceptionally rich, and at the same time singularly delicate, wood wind being joined with pizzicato violins. As for the cachuca, the writing of it must have been an easy task for Sir Arthur; but it makes a great hit, as, happily, does the quartet, "In a contemplative fashion," which doubtless cost the composer a good deal of thought and ingenuity. A suave melody, which suggests the quiet calm deliberation of which the two young couples speak, is the foundation of the number, and this is repeated piano as a trio, while each in turn comes forward and argues out, forte, the position of matters as affecting him or her. This leads to an outburst of temper on the part of the girls and remonstrances on that of the men, which suddenly dies away, giving place to a quiet repetition of the original theme. The quartet is in common time, the effect being gained by placing rapid passages of semi-quavers above the continuous subject, the dotted crotchets and quavers of which, somehow or other, seem to give an idea of the deliberative frame of mind in which the public is approached. An obvious point is strangely missed in the accompaniment of a very funny song that falls to the Grand Inquisitor, Don Alhambra del Bolero. He quite incidentally mentions toddy, and there is an irresistibly comic burst, as of bagpipes; a hornpipe sounds when the name of Admiral occurs, and there is a third verse, at the end of which we look for a third joke, but none is forthcoming. This is a palpable omission that should surely be supplied. The martial rattle with which Giuseppe's reference to a review is hailed is in the same vein. Perhaps the quintet "I am a courtier grave and serious" is a trifle reminiscent of the gavotte in The Sorcerer; but it is a most taking melody.

Mr. Gilbert's book is invested with peculiar point by the "business" which he has so ingeniously devised; for his adroit hand may be continually traced. He and Sir Arthur are fortunate in their exponents. Miss Ulmer has become a capital operatic actress since she has been at the Savoy, and she remains an accomplished vocalist. She is the Gianetta, and a most agreeable young Venetian she makes, while Miss Jessie Bond is the Tessa—that is to say, Tessa is the most vivacious of contadine, full of fun, overflowing with high spirits, a smile on her lips, a sparkle of humour in her eyes. One is forced to follow her movements, for she is always en scène, and there is a peculiar spontaneity in all she does. She sings admirably, moreover, as does Mr. Pounds, the Marco, and he, too, has learned to act. Having Mr. Rutland Barrington for a companion is a very great help to him, no doubt, but he does his own share of the work, and does it very successfully. If Mr. Denny did not greatly strike us, we must admit that his natural quaintness is well displayed as the Inquisitor. Mr. Frank Wyatt, the Duke, acts with sprightliness and gravity, as the occasion demands; still Mr. Brownlow does better as vocalist than actor. To a great extent he seems to meet the author's idea of the Duke's "suite," Luiz. Miss Decima Moore made a very promising début as Casilda, and Miss Rosina Brandram does useful service as the Duchess. The scenes are notably picturesque and artistic. In every respect, indeed, The Gondoliers sustains the reputation of all concerned.

THE CATTLE SHOW.

ALTHOUGH the number of sheep exhibited at the Smithfield Club's Show this week is exceptionally large, there is a falling off in the entries, both of cattle and of pigs, compared with last year and the year before. In cattle more particularly the decrease is large, being compared with last year as much as fifty-three. At first sight this is not a little remarkable, as undoubtedly there is a lightening of the agricultural depression. Farming is, unfortunately, far from prosperous, yet there is improvement, and with improvement one might have expected an increase in the Show. The first reason, no doubt, is that the foreign demand for the best breeds of British cattle has considerably lessened the number of animals fit for exhibition. Another reason generally assigned is that those who send beasts to the Agricultural Hall, not with the hope of getting prizes, but in the expectation that they will sell for better prices than animals not exhibited, were disappointed last year, and therefore did not enter into the competition this year. For the objects to attain which the Show was established this is unfortunate. It tends to confine exhibiting more and more to those rich landowners and farmers who can disregard the state of agriculture at the moment; but, undoubtedly, so far as the present Show is concerned, it is an advantage, as it lessens the number of inferior animals. Taken altogether, the classes of cows and oxen are exceedingly good. There is an evenness of quality not often seen, and in consequence the competition was very keen. The Club has introduced two changes this year, both of which, we venture to think, are to be commended. In the first place, it has given prizes for Kerry cattle and the sub-varieties of the breed. These little animals are very valuable for their milk-giving qualities; and though, owing to their size, they do not carry very much meat, yet what they do carry is excellent. Besides, the breed is specially fitted for mountainous districts, and it is desirable that everything possible should be done to prevent it from dying out. The pretty little animals undoubtedly add to the attractions of this year's Show. The second change introduced by the Club is intended to ensure that the ages entered shall be the true ages. The policy of the Club for a long time past has been to encourage early maturity, and, aided by many other circumstances, it has succeeded. But there have been for years past complaints that the dentition did not accord with the returned ages. Accordingly, this year a rule has been adopted "that all cattle and sheep exhibited at the Smithfield Club's Show shall have the state of their dentition examined by the veterinary inspectors previous to the judges making their awards. If the dentition is inconsistent with the age as given in the form of entry, the stewards shall disqualify such animals, and report to the Council." The operation of this rule has been to disqualify fourteen animals, and naturally to excite much dissatisfaction. Nobody charges bad faith; but it is clear that some means ought to be adopted to ensure that the stated ages shall be correct. At the annual meeting of the Club on Tuesday afternoon Mr. Bruce, of Inverquhomery, and others brought the matter before the members. Mr. Bruce, in particular, complained that an animal which he believed to be the second best in the Show, which was within the proper age, and had been brought all the way from Inverness, could not be exhibited. The Chairman replied that the matter had been referred to a special committee, and should be most carefully considered, with a view to amend the rule in a way satisfactory to the members. This is, of course, right. Nobody pretends that dentition is an infallible test. Indeed, it is not improbable that the influences which force early maturity may force dentition also. But, at the same time, it is clearly expedient that precautions should be taken to ensure that the return of ages shall be correct.

The awards agree more nearly with those of Birmingham than they often do. Particularly, the champion beast and its competitor were precisely the same. As at Birmingham, the Queen has carried off an unusually large number of honours. She sent to the Show altogether thirteen animals in the cattle classes, and all but one of these carry off a prize. She takes the championship of the Show, the Breed Cup for shorthorns, six first prizes, two second prizes, and four thirds. At Birmingham the Queen exhibited eight animals, and with these she won the championship of the Show, the Two Breed Championships for shorthorns and Herefords, four first prizes, three second prizes, two high commendations, and a reserve. This is an extraordinary achievement in a single year, and says much for the management of the Royal farms. As already stated, the champion beast at the Agricultural Hall and the reserve for championship are the same as at Birmingham. And a Devon Breed Cup is likewise awarded to the same animal as at Birmingham, but for cross breeds and for Herefords the Birmingham awards are not endorsed. As our readers are aware, the judging proceeds from the classes and breeds to the determining of the best ox or steer and the best heifer or cow respectively in the Show, and then to the selection of the best animal. Both at Bingley Hall and at Islington the same animals were selected as best ox or steer and as best heifer or cow, and between the two animals selected as such was in both cases the final competition for the championship. The former is a red and white-breasted shorthorn, bred by Mr. Bruce, of Inverquhomery, and exhibited by the Queen. It is a handsome beast, very broad over the back, and evenly fleshed; its age is between three and four years—exactly, 1,311 days—and its weight is 2,402 lbs., showing a daily gain of weight since birth of 1 lb. 13½ ozs. Its competitor was bred and exhibited by Mr. Clement Stephenson, of Sandford Villa, Northumberland. She is a pure-bred Polled Angus heifer, an extremely beautiful animal, aged two years, eleven months, three weeks, and six days. The length of time taken by the judges in giving their award, and the difference of opinion amongst the public, prove how nearly equal in merit those two animals were; and yet they differ greatly in appearance. The ox is a massive beast, weighing over 21 cwt., while the heifer is diminutive, weighing less than 14 cwt. But both are fine and beautiful specimens of their breed. All breeds were well represented, so far as quality goes; but, with the exception of Sussex and Highland cattle, all were much fewer than during the past two years. Shorthorns were not much more than half as numerous as they were twelve months ago; and crossbreeds fell off nearly one-third. The Devons did not show as much decrease as most of the others, and they were fine taken altogether. The Herefords were also very excellent, almost without an exception; and, indeed, the same may be said of all the other breeds, without running in detail through them.

The show of sheep, whether as regards numbers or quality, was one of the best that has ever been held. The South Downs were excellent almost without exception. There were no fewer than forty-seven pens of them, and all of great merit. The pen exhibited by Mr. Edwin Ellis, which carried off the championship prize, it would be difficult indeed to equal. The Hampshire Downs and the Shropshires were also of a high excellence, and, speaking generally, the long-wool sheep likewise were above the average of recent years. Amongst the pigs the Berkshires formed a fine show, the classes being large and even. But we are inclined to think that over-fatness is too much favoured. The breeders of pigs that put up lean meat complain that there is no use in sending animals to the Agricultural Hall, since judges nearly always award the prizes to the over-fed. Consequently, there is year after year a display of excessive fat, and too great an absence of kinds which are commercially most successful. We venture to think that the Club ought rather to discourage than encourage over-feeding, for the public taste at present is certainly not for excessive fat. We would add that, in our opinion, hardly enough attention is given to sheep and pigs by the Club. The sum offered in prizes at the present year's Show amounts to 3,240*l.*, of which 1,850*l.* was given to cattle, 95*l.* to sheep, and 90*l.* to pigs. Granting all that may be urged to prove the commercial superiority of cattle over both sheep and pigs, we submit that the prizes might be somewhat more equally awarded. After all, the foreign competition with British pig-feeders is much more keen than with the flock-master or the owner of cattle. It is chiefly, indeed, in hog products, to use their own phrase, that Americans compete with us. Yet it is obvious that pig-feeding may be made an exceedingly profitable branch of farming. There is much food which would be utterly wasted on the farm unless it is given to pigs. The pig may, therefore, be fed at little or no cost for a considerable time, and if it were only for that reason it would surely be not impolitic to give all the encouragement which the Smithfield Club can give to breeders and feeders of pigs at home. But of course encouragement will be thrown away except it is guided by an enlightened judgment. What ought to be aimed at is the breeding and feeding of those kinds of animals which are commercially the most profitable. That is to say, those which do not quickly put up excessive fat, but rather those which put up lean flesh, and which arrive at maturity early. Sheep, again, are exposed to keen foreign competition. The wool-grower, indeed, has to meet the competition of the colonial flock-master, wherever he turns, and though the competition in mutton is not so great, it still is considerable, and is likely to increase. If, then, the giving of prizes by such Societies as the Smithfield Club has any effect upon the methods of breeders and farmers, it is surely desirable that the breeders and feeders of both sheep and pigs should receive somewhat more encouragement than they do at present.

RECENT CONCERTS.

M. BENOÎT'S Lucifer, which was performed at the Albert Hall last Wednesday week, was thoroughly discussed in these columns last April, on the occasion of its first production in England. Mr. Barnby was well advised in repeating the work so soon, for it is difficult to judge definitively from a single performance of the merits of a composition by an artist of so much ambition and claim to originality as the Flemish master. That the favourable impression created by the first performance was wholly confirmed cannot be asserted. Lucifer contains much that is charming, and occasionally even impressive; but the defects of the work, on the whole, are more than its merits, and it can only be regarded as showing a promise of better things. Whether this promise has been fulfilled there is no means at present of judging. The best parts of the work are undoubtedly the opening chorus—which is full of fine and dignified writing—and the solos and concerted music descriptive of the four elements. In his more elaborate numbers the composer's inability to develop his themes is continually apparent. His subjects are in nearly every instance melodious and appropriate; but the construction is so faulty and the development so poor that the general effect becomes, by constant thematic repetition, weak and wearisome. Lucifer was originally produced more than twenty years ago. It would be interesting to have the opportunity of hearing some of its composer's later music; for it is upon this that M. Benoît's ultimate reputation must rest. The performance last week, though not so good as on the former occasion, was, on the whole, satisfactory. Unfortunately M. Blauwaert, the Belgian baritone who created such a sensation by his singing of the title-part last April, was prevented by illness from appearing. His place was taken, at a very short notice, by Mr. Watkin Mills, who also sang the solos allotted to the Earth. It is no discredit to this conscientious artist to say that he was hardly equal to the double burden which he had to sustain. Mr. Ivor McKay sang the tenor music with taste; but the effect of the pretty solo of the Water Spirit was spoilt by its being taken too slowly. Miss MacIntyre and Mme. Belle Cole were the soprano and contralto; their singing of the Fire Duet was the most enjoyable number of the whole performance. The choral singing was, with but few exceptions, of great excellence; the precision of intonation and delicacy of tone being especially remarkable. The mocking laughter of Death might with advantage have been a little more fiendish; but the passages in which this occurs are among the least successful parts of the work, and what effect they make is lost by too frequent repetition. On the whole, the performance was one to increase Mr. Barnby's reputation; the work is hardly likely to become widely popular, but it is worth occasionally hearing, at all events until its composer produces something better to replace it.

Among the minor concerts of the last few weeks, the first place is due to the very interesting Recitals given at Steinway Hall by Messrs. Max Heinrich and Schönberger. The first of these, which took place on the 28th ult., was devoted to the works of Schubert, the pianist playing one of the Sonatas (Op. 42), and four of the Impromptus, and Herr Heinrich singing no less than eight of the composer's songs. At the second concert, on December 5th, the programme was made up entirely of the works of Schumann, while at the last, which is announced for next Tuesday, it is to consist of compositions by Brahms. Both artists are so well known as refined and cultivated musicians that their performances do not demand detailed notice, but a word of special praise is due to Herr Schönberger for not only appearing as a solo pianist, but also for accompanying all the vocal numbers. Accompaniments are unfortunately too often so atrociously played that it is altogether an event of exceptional interest when they are performed in such an admirable manner.

Sir Charles Hallé's second orchestral concert, which took place on Friday week, was better attended than the first of the series, though even on this occasion St. James's Hall was not as crowded as the excellence of the concert deserved. A further hearing of Sir Charles Hallé's Manchester band confirms the impression that its playing as nearly approaches perfection as anything of the kind which has been heard in London for a long time. Performances more excellent in every respect than those of the Entr'acte in B flat, and Ballet Air in G from Schubert's "Rosamunde," or than the Larghetto, Largo, and Allegro from Handel's Concerto Grosso in B minor, it would be difficult to imagine, and even a work of second-rate merit, such as Gade's Hamlet Overture, was rendered interesting by the manner in which it was performed. In addition to the works mentioned, Sir Charles Hallé played Beethoven's Fourth Pianoforte Concerto in his very best manner, the orchestra being conducted by Herr Willy Hess. The second part of the programme was entirely devoted to Dvořák's Third Symphony, a fine but uneven work, which was probably unfamiliar to most of the audience, though it deserves to be heard more frequently. All the performances at this concert were so good that it would be almost impossible to point out any defects; certainly no amateur should miss the opportunity of hearing such admirable orchestral playing.

The chief place in the programme of last Saturday's Crystal Palace Concert was devoted to Mr. Frederick Cliffe's Symphony in C minor, the extraordinary success of which on its production at these concerts last Easter, and subsequently at a performance by the Philharmonic Society, was once more ratified on this occasion. The work is certainly a very remarkable one to proceed from the pen of a young musician who had hitherto made no especial mark, and it raises high expectations as to what he will produce in the future. If Mr. Cliffe only maintains the position this Symphony has won for him, his name will occupy a foremost rank among native composers. The only novelty in the programme was Goldmark's Overture to Sakuntala, an early and not over-interesting work by a composer whose music has never met with acceptance in this country, though it is highly esteemed in Vienna. The most remarkable feature of the work is the number of changes of tempo which it contains. Though by no means long, a list of twelve different tempi was given at the beginning of the analytical programme of the Overture. The pianist at this concert was Miss Marian Osborne, one of the most promising young artists produced by the Royal College of Music. She played in a thoroughly conscientious and scholarly manner Beethoven's Fourth Concerto and Mendelssohn's Prelude and Fugue in E minor. M. Blauwaert, the Belgian baritone, had been announced to sing, but his place was taken by Mme. Louise Pyk.

The chief interest at the last Monday Popular Concert lay in the appearance of Mr. Plunket Greene, the young bass singer who last month created so great a sensation in Berlin by his singing of German Lieder and selections from Wagner's Music-Dramas. Mr. Greene has made great progress since he first sang in public. His voice, which combines the rare qualities of great strength with beauty of tone, has become more even and more under control, and his vocalization and enunciation are singularly finished and refined. At Monday's concert he sang Brahms's "Feldeinsamkeit" and "Todessehnen," and Dr. Hubert Parry's "Fill me, boy, as deep a draught," three songs which were admirably adapted to show the versatility of his talent and his success in very different styles. His singing created a real sensation, and the audience would gladly have heard him again, but he wisely declined encores. Mr. Greene was fortunate in having so good an accompanist as Mr. Battison Haynes. The rest of the programme consisted of Beethoven's Quartet in F major, Op. 59, No. 1; Mendelssohn's Andante and Scherzo from an unfinished string Quartet; Boccherini's Sonata in A major, for Violoncello and Pianoforte, and Beethoven's Sonata in A flat, Op. 110, for Pianoforte Solo. The best performance was that by Signor Piatti of Boccherini's graceful and melodious work, which was greeted with loud applause. Mme. Haas gave a careful rendering of Beethoven's Sonata, but her style is not broad enough to do justice to so great a work.

The second of Mr. and Mrs. Henschel's delightful Vocal Recitals took place last Wednesday afternoon, when the programme contained the usual admirable selection of old and modern music, all of which was performed in the admirable manner which makes these concerts so thoroughly enjoyable. Where everything was so good it is difficult to single out any one performance for special praise; perhaps Mr. Henschel's singing of Löwe's setting of "Der Erlenkönig" was the most remarkable feat, for the singer infuses an extraordinary amount of dramatic character into the composition, without ever sacrificing the purely lyrical element. The programme included four compositions by Mr. Henschel—namely, a very beautiful setting as a duet, in canon form, of Kingsley's "Oh! that we two were maying"; a setting of Goethe's "Schweizer Lied," "Uf'm Bergli"; a charming song, from an unpublished opera, A Sea Change; and a dramatic ballad, "Jung Dieterich"—all of which show the composer's talent to much advantage.

MR. JEFFERSON DAVIS.

THE well-known epigram in which Talleyrand stated the exact character of the news of Napoleon's death might with absolute fairness be applied to the news of the death of Mr. Jefferson Davis. At any time before 1869 it would have been an event. Last week it was only a piece of news—more interesting, indeed, for the memories it revived than what usually comes from the dull struggle of place-hunters in the United States, but still certain not to have any practical consequences. The drama in which Mr. Davis played his part was as completely ended long before his death as the game of the Emperor was years before he died at St. Helena. Whether Mr. Davis's cause may not revive, as the Emperor's did, in some more or less modified form is a question not without interest. For the present, however, the fight may be said to have been fought out. If any man chooses to prophesy that it can never be begun again, it is impossible to prove that he is wrong. There is even a good deal of evidence, which cannot be shown to be merely superficial, that he is right. In any case, Mr. Davis's share in the struggle had been over twenty years before his death. He recognized the fact with the natural good taste of a brave man, who, having done his best, accepts defeat without whining. The Federal Government, under the influence, no doubt, of mixed motives, made it, after treating him with petty brutality, comparatively easy for its enemy to live in peace, and Mr. Davis availed himself of the opportunity with dignity. Without unbecoming recantations; without, indeed, by word or act, deserting his principles, he made no futile attempt to resist or escape the inevitable. He remained with his country in its day of defeat and suffering, as Lee did. He defended himself against his critics (not the least bitter of them were Southerners) in his history of the war. Three years ago he delivered a series of speeches, which were not, and can hardly have been meant to be, a bid for political office. With these two exceptions, however, he led a retired life, during the earlier years in business, and then on a plantation which was left him by will.

The leading facts of Mr. Davis's life have been so recently repeated in obituaries that it is not necessary to detail them again. He was in every way a typical Southerner. His father was a Kentuckian, who emigrated to Mississippi, and there acquired a cotton plantation. The son went through the usual training of a Southern gentleman. At the West Point Military Academy he received by far the best scholastic training which is to be obtained in the United States. He gave, in return for his education, several years' service against the Indians, in the Black Hawk war, and in the ordinary military police work of the frontier. When his debt was paid he left the service, and established himself on the plantation he had inherited from his father in Mississippi. In the natural course of things, he took to politics, which was once thought as much the regular career of a Southern planter of ambition and ability as of an English country gentleman whose energies were not satisfied with the management of his estate and routine country work. As a matter of course, too, Mr. Davis took the Southern side. He was a Democrat—that is to say, he believed that the Constitution of the United States was a bond between sovereign States, that the individual members of the League had not deprived themselves, indeed could not deprive themselves, of their sovereign rights, and that the Union could only be preserved as long as a careful balance of political power was maintained between the two great groups of States which were divided in interest by the nature of their social and industrial organization. Until the crisis came, with the election of Mr. Lincoln, the political history of the United States was contained in the struggle to maintain this balance. One of its phases was the Mexican War, undertaken, if not with the avowed intention that it should, yet most certainly with the hope that it would, lead to the extension of the area of the Southern slave-holding group of States. Mr. Davis, who had helped to promote the war, took a native share in it. He commanded a regiment of Mississippian volunteers, and at Buenavista showed some skill and eminent personal courage. After the war he resumed his work as a politician. For a time he was Minister of War, and showed undoubted administrative ability in office. But whether as Minister or as member of Congress, his great object was always to defend what he believed to be the rights and interests of the Southern States. When the election of Mr. Lincoln by a minority of the voters of the Union, and a minority of an exclusively Northern origin, showed that the South could in future be completely outvoted by its rival, Mr. Davis was one of the heartiest of those who held that the time had come for the exercise of the reserved rights of the States, and that the sovereign powers which had freely entered the League for certain purposes might now retire from it when it seemed certain that those purposes would no longer be served by its continued existence. The Secession followed, and then the war. While it lasted Mr. Davis's history was the history of the Confederate States of America. When it was over he ceased to have any public history at all. His personal influence was proved by the fact that he kept the lead to the last, and his administrative abilities by the fact that he presided over the creation of an army out of chaos, and kept that army efficient in spite of the utmost penury in money and stores; but the evidence for these truths makes a long narrative.

It is not, however, by his administrative ability or personal courage that Mr. Davis must be judged. He stands or falls by the judgment which is to be passed on the Secession. It was largely his work, and if it was evil, then he must be condemned as a statesman. Any fair criticism of this, the most remarkable passage of American history, must distinguish between the wisdom of Mr. Davis's action and its technical justification. It is quite possible to believe that he and the school of Southern politicians to which he belonged had interpreted the Constitution of the United States correctly, and yet to doubt whether the election of Mr. Lincoln, by the help of the Abolitionists, was a danger which justified the extreme course taken. Virginia and other border States did doubt it, for they took no part in the Secession till they were called upon to assist in coercing the Gulf States. It is, indeed, hard to believe that fear of attacks by the Abolitionists was the chief motive which influenced the Southern leaders. Mr. Lincoln's party could only abolish slavery by an amendment to the Constitution, which would have required the votes of three-fourths of the States. Such attacks as John Brown's could do no real harm, and would as a matter of fact have been made easier and more numerous by a recognition of Southern independence. The whole frontier line would have swarmed with John Browns, and the hold of the slaveowner on the slave would have become as difficult as the incessant intrigues of the Abolitionists, no longer held in even a semblance of check by the Federal Government, could have made it. The possession of power at Washington would not have given the Abolitionists the control of an army, and it is in the last degree doubtful whether they would have secured any general support in the North, which showed no desire to free the slaves till it was thoroughly angered by the disasters of the war. It is impossible to believe that fear of what might be done to the South had nearly so much influence on the Southern leaders as the desire to carry out a policy of their own free from all control by the North. What that policy would have been is clearly indicated by Mr. Davis's own very candid declaration, when in prison at Fort Monroe, that, if the Secession had succeeded, it was his intention to have taken Mexico in hand. In short, he would have played, on a larger scale and in a more statesmanlike manner, the game played in Central America by the filibuster Walker. We do not know that, in a world which has been mainly brought to its present condition by fighting, there would have been anything particularly wicked in such a course. As a practical policy, however, it must be judged by the result. Mr. Davis, who never believed that the North would allow the South to go in peace, must bear the blame, whatever it is, of having deliberately provoked a struggle. We now see that he judged the forces he would have to contend against very ill; and there can be no doubt about the blame which attaches to that sort of mistake. The man who makes it may be daring, able, and honest; but he can hardly be called a great statesman. The first duty of one who is to be held to deserve that title is to see things as they are, and to calculate accurately. On purely technical grounds a better case can be made out for the Southern leaders. It has never been disputed that the American Constitution was the work of independent communities, which banded themselves together for definite purposes. What powers they did not confer on the Federal Government they reserved to themselves. They did not expressly resign their sovereign rights; and, even if they had done so, the resignation would only have affected the generation which made it. That at the time of the formation of the Union none of the States thought they had committed themselves to an indissoluble union is clear from the language of their delegates, and from the fact that Massachusetts threatened to secede during the war of 1812 with England, which it had exerted itself to provoke. Whether the doctrine of State rights, as it was defined by Mr. Calhoun, would have been as popular as it was in the South if that section of the Union had possessed the preponderance of power; whether the Southern leaders were justified by the circumstances in insisting on their legal rights; and whether they did not commit an act of signal folly when they chose to ignore the fact that the North and West, influenced like themselves by their manifest interests, had adopted a wholly different view of the meaning of the Constitution, are questions of conduct, and do not touch the question of principle. It is the common belief that the war has decided the dispute for ever. Perhaps it has, but perhaps, also, it has not. He would be a bold man, or one who had little cause to boast of his knowledge of human nature, who should decide that, if ever two sections of the Union of approximated equal power were again to find themselves strongly divided on a question which touched their interests closely, one of them would not soon be persuaded that J. C. Calhoun had read the Constitution aright after all. Not one war, nor many wars, can settle such a question. For the present, however, we hear nothing of the cause for which the Confederates fought. Between North and South it has been settled for the time being by the old-fashioned method of hard fighting. If it is revived, it will be on other pretexts and between other sections. It will be conducted, too, by leaders of a different stamp from Mr. Davis, who represented a social order and a class of politician which have disappeared for ever from the United States—whether for their good or not remains to be seen.

EXHIBITIONS.

THE Fine Art Society is lavish in its frequent offerings to the public of small exhibitions of selected subjects. While the fine collection of pencil and crayon drawings, which we lately criticized, is still on its walls, the Society offers fresh attractions. The latest collection is of water-colour drawings from the brush of Mr. A. W. Weedon, explained in a chatty preface by Mr. Wedmore. The series is rather too uniform in treatment, the skies of cold greys and blues, the hillsides rather heavily treated, the tone in most cases kept in a low key; but the general public, as apart from the artistic public, will be likely to find considerable pleasure in viewing this exhibition. Mr. Weedon has selected his subjects from Scotland and from Sussex, two parts of Britain as different as possible, yet the general impression made by the exhibition is rather one of uniformity than of contrast. Mr. Weedon keeps persistently before him his fixed ideas of the rules of composition and harmony, without giving sufficient play to the charm of the accidental in Nature. But when he turns his attention heavenwards, he is quite carried off the feet of his theories, and is completely fascinated by his subject. He has treated in a simple and impressive manner some fine skies, with great banks of cumuli clouds rolling to landward, in "A Breezy Day, South Coast" (19); and in "Craig Tollie" (9), the smoke-like cloud settling down on a rocky hill-top is very impressively and skilfully handled; while "On the West Coast, Aultbea," (48), is a striking study, of a great stormy sky rolling over a peaky, dark blue, rocky range of hills. It is interesting, too, to see the several sides of a town, as shown here in the views of Rye, first taken from the marshes, and next in sunshine, and yet again with a storm clearing off. Arundel appears here as a fair and bland city, seen through a green mist. "Kilchurn Castle," looking forlorn and haunted, with its wide waste of water in 43, seems scarcely the same building when regarded from its other (57), its landward side, with the rough, rocky background. The "Waves on the South Coast" (56) come tumbling in in a good noisy fashion. The landscapes, with much detail, do not strike us as being so good, and the feeble trees in the wet "November Evening" (40) are not exhilarating to behold.

At Mr. Stephen Gooden's Gallery, 57 Pall Mall, may now be seen Constable's "A Lock on the Stour." This famous example, which is in remarkably fine condition, shows no sign of turning black with age, but is as luminous and lustrous as ever. Mr. Gooden proposes to publish a mezzotint engraving of this exquisite little masterpiece, which he has entrusted to Mr. Frank Short.

At Messrs. Shepherd's Galleries in King Street are still to be seen some interesting specimens of the English school of landscape, despite the fact of several pictures having taken their departure and gone into private keeping. A river piece by Constable, a wooded landscape by Crome, and a quaint view—said to be painted by Gainsborough, and to have been once in the possession of Horace Walpole—of the corner of a common, with a windmill perched on the top of an abrupt hill—these are all luminous and charming. A frame containing eight small paintings by D. G. Rossetti, illustrating scenes in the history of Tobias, are gem-like in colour. A small full-length portrait, said to be of Her Majesty at the age of three, by Stephen Poyntz Denning, presents a demure little maiden in the large bonnet and the spencer of the period. A large river piece by E. J. Niemann has recently been added to this collection.

MONEY MATTERS.

THE Stock Exchange Settlement, and the near approach of the end of the year, have not prevented a further fall this week in the rates of interest and discount. At the Stock Exchange Settlement, which began on Tuesday, the demand was so small that bankers had to lend all that was required at about $4\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. While the settlement was going on, loans were made till the middle of January at 4 per cent., and even less, and money was lent from day to day at $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., and sometimes even as low as 1 per cent. At the same time the discount rate kept falling day after day, until it is now little more than $3\frac{3}{8}$ per cent. It is remarkable that, nevertheless, much gold has not been withdrawn from the Bank of England. The rate of discount in Germany is from $1\frac{1}{4}$ to $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. higher than in London; and in New York as much as 10, 12, and 15 per cent. is being charged for loans on the Stock Exchange; yet during the week ended Wednesday night only a quarter of a million in gold was withdrawn from the Bank of England. It is true that more would have been taken for Berlin, were it not that the Bank Directors raised the price at which they sell bar gold; but, as they cannot raise the price for sovereigns, it is remarkable that it has not been found worth while to withdraw sovereigns either for Berlin or for New York. Apparently the great financial houses all over the world are so desirous not to disturb the London money market that they will not take advantage of the better rates offering abroad to withdraw much gold from the Bank of England. How long this will continue nobody can say. It is believed now that gold will not be sent to New York, at least until next month; but there is an active demand for Germany and India, while it is reported that some of the metal will very shortly be sent to

Buenos Ayres. The influences which have been able to prevent gold withdrawals in inconveniently large amounts up to the present may prove strong enough to hinder them until the year has ended. If not, a considerable withdrawal may all at once put an end to the artificial ease, and may cause rates to bound up considerably. But, unless there is a gold scare, rates will probably remain low throughout the month; for the supply of money in the outside market is exceptionally large for this time of the year.

As we anticipated, there has been a recovery in the price of silver. The improvement in trade which is raising prices all round is necessarily acting upon silver like other commodities. And this influence is heightened by the buying of our own Mint, as well as by that of the French, Japanese, Spanish, and other Governments. Over and above all this, the silver party in the United States is intent upon compelling a larger coinage of the metal. Mr. Windom's plan disappointed the market last week, but the disappointment was partly based upon a misconception. We do not yet know what the action of Congress will be; but whether it adopts the Secretary's plan in some modified form, or simply increases the coinage of silver, a larger consumption of the metal in the United States must tell upon the market.

The extraordinary cheapness of money has led to a considerable investment in Consols by capitalists unable for the moment to employ their surplus funds more profitably. And as there are few sellers, and not much stock carried over in the market by speculators, the price advanced sharply. Speculative business, however, has been dull all through the week. Operators distrust the abnormal ease of the money market. No one, indeed, would be surprised if it were suddenly to give place to temporary stringency. Therefore, they are not willing just now to engage in new risks. And their unwillingness is heightened by several other circumstances. In the first place, the news from Rio is not encouraging. It seems clear now that the revolution was the work of military adventurers, and the beginning of pronunciamientos in a South American State is not a pleasant prospect for investors. Therefore, there was a sharp fall in Brazilian securities of all kinds early in the week, and that fall influenced more or less every department of the Stock Exchange. Then, again, the crisis in the Argentine Republic grows acuter every day, and disquiets all holders of Argentine securities. Further, there are persistent rumours of impending revolutionary movements in Spain. And, lastly, the speculation on the Berlin Bourse inspires apprehension. The speculators, with the aid of the banks, have very skilfully tided over their difficulties month after month. But the difficulties have all the time been accumulating. And people are not sure that the operators will be equally successful at the end of this month. It is certain that money will be very dear, and it is possible that the banks may not be able to lend all that is required. It is probable, too, that the labour disputes in the coal trade may cause a further fall in mining shares, and may thus increase the difficulties. For all these reasons, speculators of late have been lessening their engagements. At the settlement this week it was found that the accounts to be carried over were decidedly smaller and decidedly fewer than they have been for some time past. Indeed, in some departments there was a scarcity of stock—that is to say, whereas lately speculative buyers have settlement after settlement being carrying over their accounts, this week there was scarcely any such carrying over in certain departments, and in many of the stocks. Therefore, it is clear that the stocks must have been bought by purchasers able to pay for them, and take them out of the market either with their own money or with money borrowed from bankers.

The decrease in speculative stocks carried over at the settlement was most marked in American railroad securities. For many months past American buying of these securities has been on a very large scale, and the securities have been, not merely paid for, but actually shipped to New York. It would seem, therefore, that at last this purchasing has nearly cleared off the securities held by speculators in this country. It is possible, of course, that English capitalists may have been buying quite lately. In any case, the speculators have got rid of their stock, and capitalists hold it, which is a source of strength to the market. And, accordingly, in spite of the dearness of money in New York, and the distrust here of our own money market, the American department is very steady. The market for British railway stocks is also strong, for the earnings of the Companies show week after week large increases. From the 1st of July to Saturday night last, to take the four greatest Companies, the Great Western and the North-Eastern had each earned 255,000*l.* more than in the corresponding period of last year, the North-Western had earned 247,000*l.* more, and the Midland 217,000*l.* more. The four Companies together show for the period mentioned an increase of 974,000*l.* over the corresponding period of last year. As it is not probable that the rise in wages, materials, and fuel will tell very materially upon the working expenses this half-year, it is natural to expect, therefore, handsome increases in the coming dividends; but next year it is safe to conclude that the higher wages and greater cost of fuel and materials will largely augment the working expenses. The great prosperity of the railway Companies in this country and in America make operators in the stock markets expect very active speculation as soon as the new year has fairly opened. And in foreign stocks and miscellaneous securities equal activity is looked for.

After the recent sharp fluctuations, the iron market has been quiet this week. The price is very little under sixty shillings a ton.

The consumption continues very large, and a period of great prosperity appears to be opening, if speculators do not again run up prices too quickly, and thereby prevent the American demand, which is otherwise sure to come next year. The copper market likewise remains quiet and steady, copper being about 50*l.* a ton. There are rumours that we are about to witness the formation of another syndicate, though recent experience, one would think, ought to have warned even the boldest against attempts to corner a great trade. The consumption of coal likewise is unusually large, and wages both in coal and iron are steadily rising. The silk market, in which there has been so great a rise, is very firm. So is the wool market. And, in fact, there is scarcely a commodity to be named which, under the influence of the improvement in trade, does not show a marked recovery from the depression of a few years ago, and a greatly increased consumption, with a rising tendency in price.

SHADOWED AT LAST!

[Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE is being shadowed by the Irish police.—Daily Paper.]

HE has gone, he has left me, I'm back at my inn,
And sit down to my snug little meal,
With the comforting thought that I now may begin
Like a "rale" agitator to feel.
With O'Brien and Dillon my lot I have cast;
For I'm "shadowed," thank goodness! I'm shadowed at last!

How vainly to draw the Executive out
Hitherto 'twas my fortune to try!
Peter Schlemihl himself wasn't more put about
By the want of a shadow than I.
But I've got it at last, and I glory to know
That my shadow will follow wherever I go.

Shall I own that at first it did give me a qualm
That policeman behind me to see,
Though my voice—or I hoped so—was passably calm,
As I asked what he wanted with me.
For 'twas just on the cards, it need hardly be said,
That the "shadow" had come with a summons instead.

And for just that one moment of awful suspense
I reproached myself much, I confess,
For renouncing those tactics of wise self-defence
That I practised last year with success.
When, before my bold challenge to tyranny thrown,
I arranged with the tyrant to let me alone.

Yes, for just that one critical moment I felt
What a delicate task he has got
Who would fain with his missiles a Government pelt,
Yet provoke no return of his shot;
Who oppressors with adequate fire would attack,
And yet never make those oppressors hit back.

For you want to be fearless, you want to be firm,
You want to use words like a flail;
But you don't want—at any rate I don't—a term
In a stupid ridiculous gaol.
You don't want a diet that luxury loathes,
And you don't—no, you don't want a change of your clothes.

But the constable, grinning, walked off, and, relieved
Of my cruel anxiety's strain,
I can feel that the object at last I've achieved
That so long I have striven to gain;
I shall simply be "watched" as a friend of the "Plan"—
Aha! they've found out I'm a dangerous man!

Yes, yes! I'm a desperate turbulent dog
As has ever a prison defied,
And I fearlessly laugh, o'er my tumbler of grog,
At its menacing walls—from outside.
I'm a firebrand—in word, if not wholly in act;
I'm a devil-may-care agitator in fact.

Poor H-re-rt and M-rl-y! that timorous lot!
How immensely my fame will increase!
I'm the only ex-Minister—hanged if I'm not!—
Who's been watched by the Irish police.
Ay, unless I'm mistaken, my rise will be fast;

REVIEWS.

AN EGYPTIAN READING-BOOK.*

NOTHING can better illustrate and signalize the progress of Egyptology in our day than the issue of the unpretending volume before us. Hieroglyphics were, till very lately, absolutely unknown except to a very select few, and the worst of it was that no student desiring to learn could find any one to teach him. Taking our three great Universities—Oxford, Cambridge, and Dublin—for instance, ten years ago, it was understood that one professor at the last-named "dungeon of learning" had a moderate acquaintance with what must, after all, be acknowledged as the parent of classical lore. When we remember that the alphabets of Phœnicia, of the Hebrew, Arabic, Syriac, Greek, and Latin languages, all took their rise in modifications of Egyptian hieroglyphics, this backwardness of the centres of education was the more remarkable. A great advance has been made of late, and he would be not only a bold, but an exceedingly ignorant and foolish, man who could deny at the present day, like Sir George Cornwall Lewis forty years ago, that the clue to the Egyptian language had been found. Not only has it been found, but it shows itself to have two qualities hitherto but little suspected to fit it for a place in ordinary education. In the first, it is absurdly easy to acquire some knowledge of hieroglyphics; and, in the second, even a smattering helps a student most materially in obtaining additional knowledge in any of the extensive fields above indicated. Most beginners, to take an elementary example, complain that in Hebrew it is difficult to distinguish at first between such letters as ם, Teth, and ם, Mem; but the difficulty is greatly lessened if they know that ם represents the  of the hieroglyphics, while ם is the owl, . It is the same with other letters, and still more so in Arabic, where ا, alif, is the hieroglyphic , palm leaf, and و, waw, a modification of the same little , bird, which also appears in the Greek υ and the Latin v. Of course analogies like these may be carried too far; but it is a curious fact that our Roman letters are more like hieroglyphics than those alphabets which, though born much nearer the source of alphabets in Egypt, were filtered through the Semitic mind, and came into conflict with that dislike of pictorial representation which was so strongly manifested both among the Jews and the Arabs. By hieroglyphics it is that we account for the great difference in shape between A and a, or between S and the old-fashioned s, which last is simply the common hieroglyphic, neither more nor less. Two forms of serpents, one crowned, the other with a long tail, give us our f and our z. Our B, with "its two bow windows," is a hieroglyph, and our little b is another; but it would be only too easy to go through the whole alphabet in this way.

To come to Mr. Budge's book; we note with pleasure that, for some years past, it has been the custom for a few students to assemble during winter evenings for the study of Egyptology, and that Mr. Budge has been their guide. Four years ago he commenced operations by transcribing for their benefit the famous Tale of Two Brothers, a curious romance, which seems to embody some foreshadowing or reminiscence of the relations between Joseph and the wife of Potiphar, whom the Arabs name Zuleykha. Mr. Budge found that at that time no hieroglyphic text of the story was extant, the version in Records of the Past (ii. 137) having been made by Mr. Renouf direct from the hieratic text in the Orbiney papyrus in the British Museum; although in 1863, Mr. Renouf, as a contribution to the forward movement, now showing such signs of vitality, published the first six pages in the Atlantis, in ordinary English letters, "as a proof of the scientific accuracy of the method of Egyptian decipherment then current among the best Egyptologists." Next Mr. Budge tackled the Possessed Princess, and we regret to observe that in his opinion the story has no historical foundation, but is "a legend written for the purpose of glorifying the God Chensu, long after the period to which it purports to belong." The innocence of Anne Boleyn, the impartiality of Gascoigne, the archbishopric of Cornhill, the patriotism of Whittington—these and many other things in which we believed have been torn from us, and now Mr. Budge ruthlessly snatches away Rameses XIII. and his queen, Raneferu, and her demented sister; and the worst of it is he must be right. Next we come to the Festival Songs of Isis and Nephthys, also transcribed from hieratic into hieroglyphics, and some other religious texts follow. After these we have some specimens of authentic history, such as the Inscription of Una. In his notes Mr. Budge assumes that everybody is acquainted with the fact that Una's account of his travellers is the only historical text of any length which has come down to us from the remote age of the Pyramid-builders, and that it is, or was lately, at Boulak. Another, but much later, document of this kind is on the base of the obelisk at Karnak, which Queen Hatshepsu devoted to the memory of her father, Thothmes I., of the eighteenth dynasty. We observe that Mr. Budge, in defiance of the pronounced opinion of Mr. Renouf in Records of the Past (xii. 127), gives the Queen's name as above, and not as Hatasu. We may assume that Mr. Renouf has modified his views. Several other historical texts follow, and then we reach philosophy, in the shape of the precepts of Kakemna and of Ptah-Hetep. Perhaps these passages are too difficult except for a very advanced class; and Mr. Budge prudently refrains from telling us which of his pupils, if any, succeeded in mastering them. It is a melancholy fact that, though these maxims are among the most interesting examples of ancient literature now extant, no English translation has ever been printed. In all Mr. Budge comprises nineteen very typical texts in this volume, and we may presume he has more in store for us, as it concludes without notes, index, or glossary. With the same learned scholar's edition of the writing on the coffin of Queen Anches-Raneferab, and its admirable vocabulary, these texts need present no very insuperable difficulty to a student of ordinary assiduity.

NOVELS.*

THE experienced reader of Mr. W. D. Howells's novels is not likely to derive much satisfaction from the title A Hazard of New Fortunes. At first sight, it is, of course, hopeful; but no one who knows the greatest of American novelists is likely to feel any confidence that he can really have tried a new experiment and abandoned the method of reflecting human character by recording trivialities for that of arousing human interest by chronicling deeds of blood. And throughout a long volume and a half the meek person who had expected little would be justified of his scepticism. The particular hazard of new fortunes which seems to give its name to Mr. Howells's new novel is not the abandonment of those precious ways and principles of fiction of which Mr. Howells is at once the prophet and the chief practitioner, but the starting of a magazine at New York by two entirely modern American citizens called Fulkerson and March, round which fictitious enterprise Mr. Howells solemnly develops his types of humanity, quite in the old slow way. Fulkerson, the manager, is the person who exhibits the American language in the latest American style, and March, the editor, is the person who keeps thinking high-toned American thoughts and taking the reader into his confidence. In order to set the magazine going and edit it, March had to come and live at New York, with his wife and his two children. For this purpose it was necessary to find a suitable "flat," and it took them about a hundred dreary pages not to do so, most of their failures, including the final one, being described with a plodding, melancholy persistence, like a bad dream. Then the journal got afloat, and proprietors and contributors visited each other's drawing-rooms, and put their hands on tables, and talked about influences and tendencies in short and intense sentences, and so it went on, and on, till all of a sudden one of the characters was shot in a street row, and the title of the story is vindicated after all. After the shooting, Mr. Howells instantly relapses into his proper style, and does not again abandon it. Presently the story concludes, because it has got two-thirds of the way down the 332nd page of the second volume, and for no other reason in the world. Still, Mr. Howells has hazarded a new fortune. He has shot a man. Who can say what will not follow? The hazard does not go further at present. Therefore it may be as well to set forth some of the new gems wherewith Mr. Howells has adorned his native language in his old style. "Fulkerson, still smoking, tore off a piece of the half-yard of French loaf which had been supplied them, with two pale, thin dishes of butter, and fed it into himself." Happy Fulkerson! "Mrs. Leighton laughed too. Like every one else, she was not merely a prevailing mood, as people are apt to be in books, but was an irregularly spheroidal character, with surfaces that caught the different lights of circumstance and reflected them." "Most of the ladies were low neck—" March interposed, "Well, I shouldn't go low neck." The girl broke into a fondly approving laugh at his drolling. "Oh, I guess you love to train! Us girls wanted to go low neck, too; but father said we shouldn't, and mother said, if we did, she wouldn't come to the front of the box once. Well, she didn't, anyway. We might just as well 'a' gone low neck." The volume also contains two persons who talked in lingo. One was a German Socialist, who always substituted b for p, g for c, and so on. The other was a Virginian girl, who equally always said ah for i, and omitted all her rs, whether they ought to have been sounded or not. The man who was shot richly deserved it, because he was engaged in advising some rioters on strike to go home, in order that the strike might have a better chance of succeeding. March's hat was knocked off by a cab-horse, because he had been walking along without looking where he was going, and "he heard the horse's driver address him some sarcasms." A sort of self-made æsthete couldn't quite bring himself to offer his hand to the handsome, but stupid and uncivilized, sister of the man who had been shot, and she tried to scratch his face. March and his wife, in the course of wandering aimlessly about New York, "got a distinct pleasure out of the gnarled elbows that a pollarded wistaria leaned upon the top of a garden-wall." Also March made jokes and uttered epigrams; but whoever wants to know what they were must look for them in the book. It takes a long time to read, but—a man was shot.

A literary gent in one of Mr. Brander Matthews's short stories says, "A good idea for a short story is a shy bird, and doesn't come for the calling." Alas! alas! it is true. The French can call a great deal better than we can, but the Americans, it would seem, cannot. The best of Mr. Matthews's stories is the first, about a tree which grew out of the bosom of a buried suicide, and behaved accordingly to his descendants; but, so far from being a short story, it is a long one, extending over some hundreds of years, and it suffers from the compression which Mr. Matthews puts upon it. It deserves to have a volume to itself.

All Dutch stories are dull, and they all have the sort of childishness from which no tale translated from Russian—not even Tolstoi's Russian—is ever entirely free. The Sin of Joost Avelingh is not free from this reproach. It is rather absurd, and makes one feel a little childish to be told on the first page of the story, in a footnote, that one must "pronounce" Joost "'Yoost,' with a 'y' as in yoke, not joke." This Joost was a melancholy man. He was brought up by his uncle, a Dutch baron, who bullied him, from mixed motives. The baron died, in Joost's company, and greatly to Joost's advantage, and Joost, who was troubled with a conscience, reproached himself for his behaviour, and the world subsequently reproached him, and therein are the makings of a story. It is all rather depressing, but also rather vivid. Whether the work is a translation, and if so by whom, does not appear. Whether it is or not, it goes to show that the Dutch are not the equals of the English or the French in the composition of contemporary fiction. As to the Americans—well, there are Americans and Americans.

Eleanor Lewknor is an English story, and a testimony to English progress. Years ago (probably Mrs. or Miss) B. Pullen-Burphy would never have dreamed of writing a novel. Now, we have Board schools, and a press, both cheap and free, and she goes and does it. The story is long, laborious, and absurd, but, in short, it is interesting to the student of the effects of education in the scullery. From beginning to end the style and language are perfectly hopeless. B. Pullen-Burphy's notion of entertaining persiflage is to substitute for "the devil" the paraphrase "a certain nameless gentleman of old standing, whom well-bred people avoid mentioning in society, however much they may invoke him, or worship at his shrine in the privacy of their homes." There are two young ladies in the book, Amy and Eleanor. B. Pullen-Burphy is never tired of telling us how witty, brilliant, and entertaining Amy was; but she commits the fatal error of continually specifying the sallies relied upon to justify these laudatory epithets. Here is one:—"Aunt Julia gave me such an oration about the wickedness of adorning my frivolous pate with little dickybird's feathers, that this child has taken to toadstools instead" was the vivacious rejoinder." This kind of thing goes on all through the story. The other girl, Eleanor, was cursed with a gigantic intellect—B. Pullen-Burphy says so—and indomitable pride, whereby her relations with her grandfather, who kicked her parents out of doors before she was born, were much complicated. She was well off, and rode a great deal, but always at full speed. "Eleanor never seemed to let her horse walk." When she went into genteel society, and found a new man to flirt with, things fell out in this wise:—"You are a good whip, I know," Mr. Drummond went on, his eyes fixed upon Eleanor. Miss Coalstone, not caring to be ignored by the pair, retired with blazing eyes and curling lips. "Several persons present have mentioned the fact of your being a perfect horsewoman." "I am fond of riding, and Black Prince—the name of my horse," she added explainingly, "seems to understand me so thoroughly. Then the country, too, is beautiful." B. Pullen-Burphy speaks of "anecdotes which had occurred to himself," and continually makes her characters use such phrases as "She is a very bright nature." Moreover, she once makes the very critic blush by her description of a scene where the heroic Eleanor pulverizes a vile seducer (of another young woman). "Rising to her full height, she looked the incarnation of womanly dignity, her loosely hanging white dress falling about her feet in artistic folds." In short, B. Pullen-Burphy is as uneducated and as far from being an original genius as it is possible to be. Yet her novel has a purpose, and that is the promulgation of an enlightened scepticism, tending to Ritualism, Spiritualism, Esoteric Buddhism, and Psychical Research. And it happens to be possible to display in two sentences the way in which the "million or two, more or less," of B. Pullen-Burphy—resident, let us say, in Middlesex—form their opinions on matters of fact. "'You mean,' said Miss Lewknor, 'the modern craze for psychical research. A friend of mine, a barrister, has completely changed his belief from a study of the literature of psychology.'" "One cannot pooh-pooh Spiritualism altogether when such men as Crookes and Wallace, who are capable of scientifically testing phenomena, credit their alleged miracles as the work of departed spirits." The almost sacred simplicity with which the noble sceptic, after urging his erudite and fearless objections to the theory of the verbal inspiration of the Bible, bows down before "Crookes and Wallace" because he has read their names in newspapers, is truly characteristic of the philosophy imbibed in the British Board school.

THE time has come when Robertson, if he is to occupy a niche in the Temple of Fame, should take his position. No attempt is made, however, in the present selection from his plays to claim for him a place among the immortals. By the exercise of what is perhaps sound judgment, those of his works which are given are treated exclusively from the standpoint of the stage, the literary character being ignored. With the exception of a brief and fairly judicious memoir by the dramatist's son, nothing is apparently added to the knowledge of Robertson and his works previously existent. The two volumes now published consist simply of a collection of plays the rights in which were held by Mr. Samuel French, a well-known theatrical publisher, whose name appears alone on the pages of the separate pieces. Errors are uncorrected, stage directions are left as they appear in acting editions, and nothing is practically new except two general title-pages, whereof one, since the numeration is continuous, is superfluous. For the mistakes that appear, for such French phrases as "pat si bête," or "esprit moquer" for moqueur, and for a phrase twice used, "biscuit and china" for biscuit china, Robertson is, of course, not responsible.

It is for later days to decide whether an edition such as now appears is adequate. In his time Robertson was a power. His success, though long deferred, was distinct when it came; and the school of imitators included in Albery a man of abilities equal, and in some respects superior, to his own. In his life and in his work Robertson is interesting rather than distinguished. His struggles in his early life are those with which most men who, without private means, adopt journalism as a profession are familiar. Strong and resolute as he was, and the manner in which he educated himself while earning his living proclaims him a man of uncommon energy, he was all but beaten in the struggle for existence. After some years of labour, during which, besides acting in various country theatres and contributing to London weekly papers, he wrote more than one play, original or adapted, he gave up the struggle in despair, and sought to enlist, but was fortunately rejected by the Horse Guards. For this anecdote his son is responsible. Instances of similar efforts to escape from an unremunerative career might, we fancy, be advanced. Success came at last, and the man who one year had looked with anxiety to the support of his family found himself the following year in receipt of an income such as few men have earned by their pen. Even then the irony of Fate pursued him. The wife who had shared his adversity did not live to share his triumph, and he, though he contracted new and happy ties, found himself the victim of incurable disease. His first wife died on the 14th of August, 1865. On the 11th of November of the same year Society, produced at the Prince of Wales's Theatre, lifted Robertson into reputation and fortune. On the 16th of January, 1871, War failed at the St. James's Theatre. Addressing his son the following day, Robertson said of the audience, "They wouldn't have been so hard if they could see me now. I shan't trouble them again." By the 3rd of the following February he was dead. A little more than five years included the whole of his career with which the world is concerned. Within that period he gave to the Prince of Wales's Theatre, Society, Ours, Caste, Play, School, and M.P.; to the Princess's, Shadow Tree Shaft; to the St. James's, A Rapid Thaw (Le Dégel) and War; to the Holborn, For Love; to the Haymarket, Home (L'Aventurière); to the Gaiety, Dreams; to the Globe, A Breach of Promise and Progress (Les Ganaches); to the Adelphi, The Nightingale; to the Theatre Royal, Hull, Passion Flowers; to the Theatre Royal, Bristol, Birth; and to the Theatre Royal, Manchester, Dublin Bay. Besides these he had conceived or made more or less progress with plays to be called Faith, Passions, and Political Comedy; had written for Sothorn Post Haste and Which is It?—pieces never produced—and had given John Parry and the German Reeds A Dream of Venice.

In this fever of production Robertson did himself less than justice. He may not perhaps be said to have written himself out, but his work grew attenuated. Not a few of the pieces named were failures, and more than one of them is not included in the present edition. Against the notion, long prevalent, that he could only write for the Prince of Wales's company his son protests, advancing a letter from Mr. John Hollingshead to the effect that Dreams was given at the Gaiety for ninety-six nights, and was consequently a success. None the less Dreams is now not undeservedly forgotten, and some of the other pieces named are wholly unworthy of Robertson. For melodrama or for serious drama of any description Robertson had little aptitude, and his method and his means in art were suited only to what has unfairly, if with a certain truth of suggestion, been called the "Teacup and saucer drama."

In this class of work Caste is his masterpiece. It was run close in the race for popularity by Ours, the chief merit of which, however, consists in the pleasant aspects of patriotism it manifests. In America, as in England, Ours was a fortunate and a popular play, and Mr. Bancroft speaks of it as "a best friend." In Caste, however, Robertson attained his high-water mark. How far he subsequently declined may be seen by those who care to compare with the last act of this play that of War, produced in 1871. The motive in the two acts is identical. A young wife, fancying herself a widow, has to be told by those around her that her husband, supposed to be dead, is alive, and has returned. In each case the health of the heroine is precarious, and in each case also the shock of good news is dreaded. The means adopted are practically the same, though in War something is borrowed from La Joie fait Peur of Mme. de Girardin.

It is difficult, however, to believe the two the work of the same hand. In a sense, indeed, they were scarcely such. Robertson's favoured method, as defined by himself in conversation, was as follows. He took a flower of juvenile sentiment and placed it in a world of cynicism. In so doing he was influenced, more or less consciously, by his admiration for Thackeray, traces of whose influence are evident in his best work. As a result of this treatment, youth and age are in constant antagonism. It is difficult, in his plays, to find a character of ripe years, male or female, whose motives are not chiefly cynical. Dr. Sutcliffe, in School, is perhaps an exception. Sometimes, indeed, as in the Hon. Bruce Fanquehere, in Play, a character for whom a certain amount of sympathy is demanded is little short of a blackleg. Common enough in literature, this contrast between youth and crabbed age in Robertson can scarcely be regarded as individual. In the case of another form of contrast, that between the gentleman and the artisan, Robertson shows both tact and right feeling. A scene in Dreams between the Duke of Loamshire and Old Gray, one of his tenants, is exquisite. For the pothouse loafer, the Radical with an itching palm, Robertson displays contempt and loathing. Mr. Bran and Mr. Bray, in M.P., are almost as clever pictures in their way as Mr. Eccles, in some aspects a masterly study. Against Eccles, however, Robertson pits Sam Gerridge, the effect of whose "Well, I am a working-man, but I don't 'owl about it" upon the first night's audience will not soon be forgotten by those who were present. It is characteristic of the times as well as of the dramatist that poetic justice in Robertson's plays is uniformly administered. Wrong is always redressed, and fortune as well as love never fails to wait on the meritorious. A relative dies at the critical moment, and leaves the impecunious hero title and fortune; the rich man of the play falls in love with the penniless heroine, whilst the heiress is unable to resist the stalwart proportions of the young scapegrace of more birth than fortune. Pleasant and healthy are these things, and it speaks well for a society that will find them, with whatever sauce they are served, stimulating fare. How pleasant they were in exposition needs no telling to those who, under the Bancroft management, looked upon a first night at the Prince of Wales's as a treat. Nothing, however, is there belonging to the big drama. They stir pleasantly the emotions, and obtain at times a warm tribute of tears. A small theatre, however, and a subdued style of acting, are indispensable to their enjoyment. With a company such as that at the Prince of Wales's—small, highly trained, and subservient to the control of a dramatist who knew his business thoroughly from experience, and was an almost unequalled stage-manager—they were seen at the best. When a larger theatre was taken, and, after the death of Robertson, a more pronounced style of acting was adopted, much of their magic was lost. More than one device adopted by Robertson failed completely in other hands. That species of antiphonal utterance of two couples of lovers upon the stage at the same time produced in Robertson's hands some very effective scenes. It has now entirely disappeared.

Robertson had a good knowledge of French and a fair familiarity with its literature. His adaptations from that language are generally good, and are not mere translations. Among French poets his favourite was Alfred de Musset, whose Chanson de Fortunio forms a sort of background to Ours as poems of the Laureate form to Dreams, War, and other pieces. He had, however, the tact not to translate any work of Musset, though traces of Musset's influence and that of George Sand are constantly apparent.

Robertson left the reputation of a boon companion and a brilliant talker, but scarcely of a wit. Both wit and humour are found in his plays. Especially noteworthy is the right feeling which he always displays. This was characteristic of the man as of his work. During a career longer than is generally supposed, he made many friends and few enemies. Faults of tact and taste were apparent in his best work, but from the possibility of arrogance in his relations with his friends Robertson was saved by a pleasant and childlike simplicity and sincerity of nature. An amusing and a characteristic trait was his delight in horse exercise when his means permitted of his indulging in it. To his previous associates he spoke of it as though it were a newly-discovered pleasure with which he had enriched mankind. Under different conditions Robertson might have been an English Sedaine. The extreme simplicity and domesticity of the devices to which he owed a measure of his success will probably militate against his fame. No one who saw Mrs. Bancroft, with sleeves turned up to the elbow, with the head of a cask for a board and the leg of a stool for a roller, making a roley-poley pudding in a hut in the Crimea, with the snow driving through the crevices of the door, and the big guns booming in the distance, will forget a picture so pretty that reflections not quite comfortable on the contrast suggested with the slaughter going on without were put aside. Will the Muse of Comedy, however, shelter these things under her wing, or will they be forgotten? Here is a point on which some day it will be safer than at present to hazard an opinion.

ÆSCHYLUS.*

THE two books here noticed together have little in common, except that both of them are written by Cambridge scholars, both of them deal with Æschylus, and both of them are important, though in different ways and in different degrees. It is the distinguishing mark of Dr. Verrall's scholarship to disregard every tradition which he cannot verify and to defy every opinion which he does not think reasonable. Never has he more clearly or (we think) more successfully displayed his audacity of innovation than in this edition of the Agamemnon. Of the traditional text he is conservative enough—perhaps too conservative. But in the interpretation he proposes to make a complete revolution. Space will not permit us to discuss the changes which he advocates in his fascinating Introduction. It must suffice to describe them; and the description will go a long way to establish them in a mind open to conviction, although it can hardly be expected that they will be adopted without controversy. Giving every credit to the Byzantine scholars for their study of "old words and old forms, and the like," Dr. Verrall remarks in his uncompromising way that a modern editor, if he adopted the dramatis personæ of the Medicean manuscript, would justly be thought a fool. Nevertheless, the story of the play as conceived by the Byzantine students of the eleventh century has hitherto been accepted, with an occasional almost inarticulate protest, by their successors in Æschylean scholarship. There has been an uneasy feeling that something was wrong, but no definite exposure of the incoherencies in the supposed plot. "Even the fifteenth century murmured"—e.g. in the Schol. in Cod. Flor. to v. 509, we find the following naïve remark:—τινὲς μέμφονται τῷ ποιήτῃ ὅτι αὐθημερὸν ἐκ Τροίας ποιεῖ τοὺς Ἕλληνας ἵκοντας. Let us briefly analyse the beginning of the play, following Dr. Verrall. Agamemnon had departed on his ten-years' war against Troy, and is supposed to have arranged with Clytemnestra that the news of his success should be telegraphed to her by a series of beacons on Mount Ida, on Lemnos, on Mount Athos, and on the highest point of Eubœa, from which last post the signal was to be passed by shorter stages to Mount Arachneus, within a few miles of Argos. According to the traditional theory, the system was worked on the night of the fall of Troy, and next morning the beacon was signalled at Argos from Mount Arachneus. Here the play begins. Clytemnestra orders a general rejoicing (without explaining the beacon-message or stating its purport), and convokes the elders, who ask for information. She then tells them that Troy has fallen the night before, and describes her means of information. She then retires, "leaving the elders to their thoughts." They do not quite accept her story; it may be a mistake; it will be best to wait. Enter a Herald, who announces that Agamemnon has returned. This—although the fleet had encountered a heavy storm, and although the size and geography of the Archipelago were as familiar to an Athenian as those of the Atlantic or the Channel to a modern Englishman. That is to say that between the fall of Troy and the arrival of the Herald (a period of a few hours) the poet is supposed to have asked his audience to believe that events had taken place which would occupy almost as many weeks. Why should he have put so severe a strain upon their imagination? The story of the beacons is a fine story finely told; but it has no necessary connexion with the rest of the plot as it is generally understood. Was Æschylus so clumsy a playwright that he violated the possibilities of the stage only for the sake of introducing a pretty passage? Incredible. But so is the story of the beacons incredible, and it is intended to be incredible. There was no pre-arranged signal between the husband and his wife, and the audience, who knew all about her guilty intercourse with Ægisthus, were to understand at once that she was deceiving the elders. No, the signal was started by the adulterer to his paramour, by the one conspirator to the other, to warn her that Agamemnon was coming, and that their plottings must now be put into action. Nor is it only at the beginning of the play that the traditional reading presents irreconcilable contradictions. They recur at the entrance of Ægisthus. What brought Ægisthus to the palace at that particular moment? His folly would be greater than his crime. Yet he does come and takes credit to himself for "combining and contriving all this difficult plot." But what plot? All the plotting has been Clytemnestra's. Yet the elders at once agree that the plot is the plot of Ægisthus. Again, we are told that the outlook for the beacon-signal had been maintained for a year. Why for a year? Are we to suppose that after eight or nine years of absence Agamemnon had suddenly hit upon this new method of communication? There is nothing to suggest such a notion. But, on the other hand, it must be remembered that in Homer the watchman of Ægisthus had been looking out for Agamemnon for a year. Such are some of the ingenious and apparently solid arguments which Dr. Verrall has put forward and which call for acceptance or refutation. It is certain that his view of the play not only divests it of its improbabilities, but induces it with that ironical interest which was so welcome to an Athenian audience, because it introduced an element of novelty into the time-worn tales on which the tragedies were founded. Here we must leave Dr. Verrall's Introduction and say a few words about his Translation and Commentary. In the former we shall find many smaller indications of his independence of tradition, many unfamiliar renderings of well-known passages, and many happy turns of English. Now and again the language is unduly artificial. Now and again a word or phrase is used in an unnatural or even an awkward sense. But it may be understood and enjoyed without the Greek, and that is a rare quality in translations. But its primary object has been to relieve the Commentary, and the young scholar must be on his guard about adopting versions, always happy and always plausible, but frequently in conflict with received interpretations. Let it not be supposed, however, that Dr. Verrall tries to steal an assent which would not be granted after deliberate examination of the evidence. His notes are models of what notes ought to be. He not only knows his own mind, but he understands and fairly states the views which he rejects, especially in the Appendices where he discusses those questions which are too elaborate for a footnote. As a specimen of his argumentation, we may summarize his views upon the much-vexed passage 498 foll. :—

κλάδοις ἐλαίας· μαρτυρεῖ δέ μοι κάσις πηλοῦ ξύνουρος διψία κόνις τάδε, ὥς οὔτ' ἀναυδος οὔτε σοι δαίμων φλόγα ῦλης ὀρείας σημανεῖ καπνῶ πυρός, ἀλλ' ἢ τὸ χαίρειν μᾶλλον ἐκβάξει λέγων.

Adopting Mr. Housman's suggestion (first put forward in the Journal of Philology, xvi. 264) that the cloud of dust testified to the approach of a returning army (the connexion of ideas was familiar to an Athenian audience), Dr. Verrall remarks, first, that there is no indication that the dust is actually seen in the distant landscape, and, secondly, that πηλοῦ ξύνουρος remains unexplained, or can only be explained as mere ornament. The second is perhaps the more formidable objection, and Dr. Verrall insists upon treating the words, not merely as not ornamental, but as possessing their exact and original force, dust conterminous with mud. Now the plain of Argos on the eastern side suffers from deficiency of water, on the western side from superabundance. The brother and sister, whose lands lie side by side, are the Dust and the Mire. "The speakers are looking from Argos eastwards towards the sea, and it is therefore the Sister, the Dust, which tells them a large body of men is approaching from the port." This theory is made the more credible when we remember how freely the meaning of words was assisted on the Athenian stage by the use of explanatory gesture. It is impossible here to give any more specimens of Dr. Verrall's work in Æschylus. With much that will provoke dissent and much that calls for careful consideration, this edition of the Agamemnon is distinguished on every page by the patient thought and the robust originality which are only found in the highest scholarship.

In making an edition of the Supplices ("dulcissimæ illæ Ἰκετίδες," as Keble called it) Professor Tucker, of Melbourne University (late of Cambridge), has attempted a bold and somewhat thankless task. But it may be granted at once that he has achieved a considerable success where complete success was impossible, and that he has done much to make possible the study of a play which has fallen into neglect "for no fault but its misfortune." We are glad to see that Professor Tucker, like Dr. Verrall, expresses a high opinion of the late Mr. Paley's work in Æschylus. It may be remembered that one of the later works of Mr. Paley was a critical edition of this very corrupt but very beautiful play. Before speaking of Professor Tucker's work in the text, it is pleasant to congratulate him upon his translation—exact, fluent, and frequently happy. But why did he mar its practical value by forgetting to number the lines? The overwhelming majority of the notes in his Commentary are, as they were obliged to be, devoted to textual criticism. To discuss these, even in sample, is beyond the scope of this article. It is disappointing to find that so careful and patient an editor declares that the result of his study is to deepen rather than diminish his distrust of the MSS. This is partly due, perhaps, to a proper but overstrained desire to make the text of Æschylus agree with, "if not a formal, at least a natural, grammar." Indeed, he expresses disagreement with Badham's well-known saying, "Scio tragicis fere omnia licere"; and this tendency has perhaps led him to suggest innovations in the text which are not absolutely necessary—e.g. at 585, ὥστ' ἀνηβῆσαι με γηραιὴν φρένα, where MSS. and previous editors had γηραιᾷ φρενί. That is impossible, says Professor Tucker, although γηθούση φρενί could stand, but if we are to express "the part or respect in which the rejuvenation takes place" we must have the accusative case. Surely that is a little too absolute. So again, a few lines later, διπλοῦν μίasma πρὸς πόλεως φανέν, where he takes away the πρὸς (id nihili est, he says, retorting Hermann's words), and writes πρό. But it would be unfair to convey the idea that Professor Tucker is a capricious emendator who loves innovation for its own sake. He always has good reasons for his protest against the (more or less) received text, and he explains them tacitly, tersely, and drily. His notes of interpretation are less frequent and more easily digested. At 595 foll. he rejects Paley's view, and adopts one that seems much preferable :—

μέγαν προφωνῶν μήποτ' εἰσὶπιν χρόνοι πόλιν παχύναι.

* The Agamemnon of Æschylus. With an Introduction, Commentary, and Translation. By A. W. Verrall, Litt.D., Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge. London and New York: Macmillan & Co. 1889.

The Supplices of Æschylus. A Revised Text, with Introduction, Critical Notes, Commentary, and Translation. By T. G. Tucker, M.A., Professor of Classical Philology in the University of Melbourne, late Fellow of St. John's College, Cambridge. London and New York: Macmillan & Co. 1889.

Here Paley made κότον the subject and πόλιν the object of the verb παχύναι, which he translated "allow to thrive." But Professor Tucker reverses the relation of the two nouns, and translates the verb "to feed fat," regarding προφώνων as a verbum vetandi, which certainly explains the μήποτε better than under Paley's view of the passage. Again, at 1037, τὸ βέλτερον κακοῦ καὶ τὸ διμοῖρον αἰνῶ, Professor Tucker seems right in throwing over the common view that τὸ διμοῖρον should be explained as "half," or (with Stanley) as quasi temperatam ex ambobus Jovis doliis. He prefers to take the word in its more natural sense of "having a double share" (or a share of two to one as compared with the other shares). For solid work by patient students Professor Tucker's edition of the Supplices may be confidently recommended. He has certainly made a substantial contribution to the scholarship of Æschylus. It is curious to notice, by the way, that the phrase ἀγώνιοι θεοὶ (Supplices, 163) is cited in Dr. Verrall's note on Agamemnon 518 in order to show that, in Dr. Verrall's opinion, it bears a meaning which Professor Tucker declares to be impossible, citing the same passage in the Agamemnon to prove his contradictory view. Even the newest lights do not always agree one with another.

THIS is an admirable little book, and it is hardly too much to say that, if studied as it ought to be, it will do more to improve Englishmen's whist than all the volumes on further developments which have been published of late. Its scope and aims are concisely set forth in the short preface, which we cannot do better than quote:—

Most writers on Whist tell at some length how to open the game; what suit to lead originally, and which card of that suit to play; when to lead or ask for trumps originally, and when not; which card to play second and third hand; which card to return when leading a suit already led; when to trump a card originally led, and when to pass; and so on. They escort the young player in comparative safety through the dangers that beset him till about the middle of the hand; then, when perplexities arise and he most needs their help, they leave him with a large stock of maxims, but without any practical aid as to how to carry them out. . . . These, and similar considerations, led me to believe that a number of examples of Whist play, late in a hand, might be of use to book players; and that, if carefully pondered on, they might improve the style of those who have travelled as far as systematic books carry them.

Cavendish has also said that "the ingenuity manifested by players at Whist in losing tricks they ought to win," late in a hand, "is at times almost superhuman." The ordinary player knows only too well the cold feeling that comes over him when he is left with four or five cards in his hand and does not know which to play; but, if he will only study this little book, he will find that his perception will increase in proportion to his pains, and he will play with confidence and certainty. Numerous examples of end-hands are given to exemplify different points of the game—such as "Remembering the turn-up card," "Winning partner's trick," "When not to finesse," "Getting rid of the lead," "Trying to give partner the lead," "Refusing to trump and playing to the score," "Discarding," &c. In all these cases the reader is furnished with essential information as to the previous play; then follows the actual play, with comments; then the conversation that ensues between the partners, generally of an amusing and recriminatory character, and, finally, the author's remarks as to the proper method. Six examples are given of the end-hand management of trumps, a common pitfall to the unwary player. To the younger student the chapters on "Sources of doubt and error," "Clay on inferences," and "Perception and no perception," are invaluable. He is there taught, in a plain and logical way, how to place or mark cards in his partner's and adversaries' hands, and to base his play upon such knowledge. Oral advice, so freely tendered him after the hand is played out, is too often untrustworthy. It frequently assumes that he ought to have known the position of cards which he could not; while the real source of his error in judgment, as is shown in the conversations in these pages, passes unobserved. He is also liable to be called to task for not adhering to book-play at an epoch of the game when the time for book-play is over, and playing by inference should begin. The dictum of "Cavendish" should never be forgotten:—"The fall of the cards may, one time or another, modify nearly every rule of play. A player who simply follows rule, and fails to grasp the situations in which rule should be departed from, is a mere machine without intelligence." The authors have done a signal service to whist in publishing this little work; and, as we have said, we anticipate that its results will be far-reaching. There are some obvious misprints at p. 63, which, no doubt, will be corrected in a later edition.

THE ELECTRIC LIGHTING ACTS.†

ANY one who can succeed in overstepping the wearisome title-page of this volume will find plenty to interest him in some of the subsequent chapters, especially if he is capable of receiving an unhallowed joy from the contemplation of the blunders of Parliament, when Parliament has specially made up its mind that for once, at least, it will not blunder. The Electric Lighting Act of 1882 is an old story now, but its memory was revived when the Act of 1888 to amend it was introduced. It remains as a monument to the folly of those who expect aught but disaster from too much legislative interference with the employment of capital. They recollected that water Companies and gas Companies had monopolies, and they knew that both the charges and the dividends of these Companies were large. They realized also that more or less modified concessions or monopolies must be granted to electric-lighting Companies. Mr. Chamberlain was at the Board of Trade, and Mr. Chamberlain at that time hated monopolies. The result was that "numerous Companies were formed, to which no less than 13,000,000*l.* of capital was subscribed—numerous orders and licences were subsequently applied for. And the result? A lamentable fiasco. Few of such licences and orders were proceeded with [sic]; still fewer, after having been granted, were worked."

† The Law relating to Electric Lighting. Second edition. Being the Electric Lighting Acts, 1882 and 1888, with a General Introduction, a Continuous Commentary, and Appendices; consisting of the Rules, Regulations, and Model Form of Provisional Order issued by the Board of Trade. By G. Spencer Bower, B.A. (Oxon.), of the Inner Temple, Barrister-at-Law; and Walter Webb, Solicitor, of the Supreme Court. London: Sampson Low & Co.

This result was due to a section in the Act which was insisted upon by Mr. Chamberlain. The section in question gave the local authority power to purchase the whole undertaking at the end of twenty-one years. But, in estimating the amount of the purchase-money, the goodwill of the concern was ignored altogether. In other words, the local authorities were to be allowed to purchase at the end of twenty-one years a business which might be bringing in a good return to its shareholders, after years without dividends, for the value of the plant and buildings. It is strange that a man of business like Mr. Chamberlain should ever have proposed, or a business assembly like the House of Lords should ever have passed, a regulation so obviously against the interests of the whole community. Of the House of Commons anything unbusinesslike might, at that time, have been expected. A man would not be wise who would invest his money under such conditions. For, in the first place, it is extremely unlikely that the amount of the valuation of plant, &c., would reach more than half what had been paid for its construction and maintenance, considering how experimental an industry electric lighting at that time was. The interest on the capital, therefore, would be such that, in addition to the high rate that would be naturally demanded by a shareholder in such a case, there would have to be a sinking fund large enough to reach half of the invested capital in about seventeen or eighteen years. That electric light could not compete with gas light under these conditions ought to have been manifest. That no heed was paid at the time to the many protests which were uttered argues an obtuse obstinacy on the part of the President of the Board of Trade, of which the cause is extremely difficult to fathom.

The chief difference between the Act of 1888 and that of 1882 is in the lengthening of this period of twenty-one years to forty-two years. The result of this tardy change is the springing up of Companies for the lighting of London, with an aggregate capital of about three millions sterling. In some districts the change is visible to the eye in the increased brilliancy of shop-windows, in others the effect has at present only been the pulling about of the roadways and "sidewalks." But before six months are past many houses and most clubs will be electrically illumined. A book like that before us, although necessarily technically dry in parts, will be found useful, not only to the directors and managers of the Companies themselves, but also to any householder who may wish to understand the duties and liabilities of the Companies, as well as the justice of their demands. It will probably interest him to know that, as a rule, every district will be assigned to two Companies, so that a limited competition will be introduced; and, where possible, these Companies will be selected on the principle that one is to work on the low and the other on the high tension system. It is not quite so certain, however, that those of the public, to whom easy locomotion is more important than brilliant illumination, will enjoy the consequent pulling up of all the main thoroughfares twice over. They are, on the other hand, to be saved from the unsightliness and danger of overhead cables.

The consumers are further protected by the fixing of a maximum charge. This charge will probably amount to about five-thirds of the cost of gas for the same amount of illumination. When once the Companies get to work fully, however, the price will be probably reduced, owing to the existence of competition. And it must be further recollected that great saving will be effected in the cost of annual papering, painting, gilding, and whitewashing. Electric light, nevertheless, will remain, no doubt, for some years a luxury. The charges will be usually made by meter, an instrument for this purpose being placed at the entry to each separate building supplied. These meters must be approved by the Board of Trade. Customers may, however, prefer to pay an annual price per lamp, in which case they may burn it for as long a period per day as they wish without any increased charge. This method will probably be adopted in cases where the whole consumption of a house is small.

The work before us is, on the whole, clearly written and generally accurate. One or two mistakes we have noticed, as, for instance, in the table on p. 12, which gives a list of the various London Companies, the St. James's and Pall Mall Electric Lighting Company has been omitted. The authors also seem to think that the "direct" system is synonymous with the "storage" system, for on p. 33 it is described as "the direct or storage" system. Direct currents can with great advantage be used with storage batteries for certain purposes. But it is not contemplated to use them generally in this way. There are also one or two points in which the purely legal information is not quite up to date. We can, however, recommend the book to all those who are interested in the subject, either as producers or consumers, as the best, if not the only exhaustive, treatise on the subject at present produced.

THE ROOTS OF THE MOUNTAINS.*

MUCH dust has been raised, and it was practically impossible that some should not be raised, about the "Wardour Street" style of The Roots of the Mountains. Distinguons. It has been frequently pointed out, and nowhere oftener and more clearly than here, that bad Wardour Street is a very bad thing. Speaking confidentially, we are not acquainted with anything which, when it is bad of its kind, is not bad. But, speaking confidentially also, we are acquainted with very few things which, when they are good of their kind, are not good. Now, Mr. William Morris's Wardour Street is on the whole a very superior specimen of the article. It is easy to caricature—we have done it ourselves, tant bien que mal, before now; and a great many other people have done it, perhaps before, certainly since. We shall not do it again. Let us only congratulate Mr. Morris on being less uncompromisingly Wardour Street (si Wardour Street y a) in his typography than he was in The House of the Wolfings. It is possible to read The Roots of the Mountains, which is a much bigger book than its forerunner, through without anything of that lancinating pain which causeth the eyes of him who readeth that forerunner to ache (it is not only Wardour Street which prefers that spelling) and to water and to burn. There is less narrative verse (though there are songs, &c., and good ones), and since, good as Mr. Morris's prose always is, it is less good than his verse, we lose something. Every now and then even the hardy reader, who is as little afraid of being bitten by archaisms as by allegories, may justly quarrel with a phrase which is out of keeping, as here:—

From the height in the pass those grey slopes seemed easy to traverse; but the warriors of the Wolf knew that it was far otherwise, for they were but the molten rock-sea that in time long past has flowed forth from Shield-broad, and filled up the whole valley endlong and overthwart, cooling as it flowed.

This geological mastery on the part of the warriors of the Wolf we own surprises us a little. And here, again, is a false note:—

These souls longed for the sheepcotes in the winding valleys under the long grey downs; and the garths where the last year's ricks shouldered up against the old stone gables, and where the daws were busy in the tall unfrequent ash trees.

That is a pretty piece enough, but it is purely modern "word-painting." And so are "the kine moving like odorous shadows" and other things. But no doubt it is hard to keep up a falsetto through 400 pages. Wherefore say some that falsetti are abominations; yet is this hardly critical.

Further comparing the book with The House of the Wolfings, the reader has the advantage of a much more interesting and more connected story (though something parallel to the former) and of a greater bulk of work. We own that, for our own part, we like our romances long. Your novel of manners and character, your story of situation, your essay, your poem, may be as short as they like, and so much the better. But, as of fighting in this way or that, and love-making in that way or this, there is no end in any life while that life is worth living, so the extensive faculties of the romance which is, or ought to be, nearly all fighting and love-making are almost infinite. Are there not eleven tightly-packed volumes from the moment when D'Artagnan appears on the butter-coloured pony to that when his dying hand grasps the bâton? Are there not a thousand verses in the Faerie Queene? And cursed be he who wishes a page or a verse short in either. As in The House of the Wolfings, Mr. Morris's main theme consists in the repulse by his favourite "kindreds" of Teutonic or Scandinavian descent of misbegotten invaders from a distance. This time, however, the invaders are not Romans, or civilized people of any kind, but "Dusky Men," apparently Huns or Mongols of some sort; and the menaced stronghold is not a "mark" in a wood, but Burgdale, a strath at the "roots of the mountains" inhabited by "kindreds," who are each named from some distinguishing cognizance, animal (sed procul, o procul este totemi!) or fantastic—the "Face," the "Bull," the "Bridge," and so forth. These Burgdalers proper, who dwell in the lower and fatter part of the valley, are farmers, and also craftsmen of considerable advancement in the arts of life; and rich, though not in the least corrupted or effeminate, but tall men of their hands all. To them belong in a sort of relationship the "Shepherds" of the upper valley; and, still more vaguely and distantly, the "Woodlanders" of the district stretching up and over the mountains themselves. Of other dales beyond these they know little—nor much of any other world at all than their own valley, except in so far as merchants come to them with wares from the distant Cities. Their chief, or Alderman, is a certain Iron-face, head of the kindred of the Face (so called from a device in their hall), a rich man, and a cunning smith in iron and other metals. His eldest son is named Face-of-God, or Gold-Mane, the tallest and handsomest of the tribe, and, though not much practised in war, a promising warrior. With him, partly as a sister, but, as she is of another kindred, more as a future wife, there has been brought up the most beautiful girl of the tribe, known as "the Bride." But one day, after there have been some unusual acts of violence committed by strangers in the outskirts of the dale, Face-of-God goes a-hunting or a-wandering in the Woodland district over the hills. And, after a time, he meets there, at first in a kind of hostile encounter, but afterwards in friendship, a brother and sister, the latter of whom seems to him more beautiful than the Bride, or any one that he has ever seen. He is entertained not inhospitably by her people, and makes a later tryst, in a mystic place called Shadowy Vale, alone with her, whom he calls at first the Friend, but afterwards the Sunbeam. Then he learns, not only her kindred and history, but also matters of great importance to the Burgdalers. The outlaws (for they are almost that) whom he has met are certain Children of the Wolf, remotely akin to the Woodlanders, but in reality the remnant of a once powerful tribe who once possessed Silverdale, a valley over the mountains, but have been driven out of it by the Dusky Men, who also hold another valley, Rosedale, and, unknown to the Burgdalers, are thinking of invading Burgdale itself. They are mere savages in all but the art of war, cruel and lustful, given to human sacrifices, and generally bestial in their habits. After skirmishes with exploring parties of them, and on learning that fresh swarms are expected, the Burgdalers and their allies resolve to anticipate the attack, and strike at the enemy in his own place, which they reach by mountain-paths known only to the Children of the Wolf. That this bold stroke ends in victory and in the re-establishment of the right owners in the conquered dales nobody needs to be told. The war part of the Saga is tempered by the history of the way in which Face-of-God is off with his old love and on with his new. The nicest girl in the book, however, is neither "the Sunbeam" nor "the Bride," both of whom are rather serious young ladies; while the Bride takes her jilting with an absence of proper spirit, and the Sunbeam does her cutting-out in a pontifical and "it-is-my-mission-to-marry-you" manner which, putting ourselves in Face-of-God's place, we should not, we think, have found enticing. Our favourite is a young person named Bow-may, of the kindred of the Wolf herself; and, as her name intimates, a very Artemis of the North. She is no prude either, has a generous but honourable liking for the irresistible Face-of-God (for whom it must be said that, if rather inconstant, he is no coxcomb), kisses him, or rather asks him to kiss her, in a very agreeable manner, in the hottest and midmost of the fight, and bestows herself on a good warrior of the Burgdalers "sith 'twill no better be." She does not make long speeches; but she is always delightful, whether she is saving Face-of-God's life by her archery in the mountain passes, or combining delight of battle with tender sentiments as above related, or sitting down wounded after her exploits to banquet "unhelmed, with a wreath of wind flowers round her head," or in the fight itself as she rains her shafts on the enemy "battle-angry," with glittering eyes, and the pommels of her cheeks burning red, and her lips dry and grey; or when, as we take leave of her performing, at the close of the story, an odd Scriptural kind of errand and conveying the second baby of Face-of-God and the Sunbeam to be fostered by the Bride and her husband, Folk-might, the new chief of Silverdale and the Sunbeam's brother, she "fell a-musing, and made as though she were listening to the voice of the Bride, but in sooth neither heard nor saw what was going on about her, for her thoughts were in bygone days."

From another point of view the chief charm of the book may seem to lie in the fighting, which is abundant and of the very best. It must be very much a matter of individual taste whether the great fight in Silverdale is found too long or not. There are about sixty pages of it; but it is excellent reading, especially the episode of Face-of-God and Bow-may embracing under the arrow-canopy, and that of Face-of-God and Folk-might meeting face to face at the top of the perron of the mote-house of Silverstead, after each has hewn his way, the one singlehanded, the other with but one companion, up a stair crowded with foes. Excellent, too, are many of the earlier passages of the fighting kind—the first hostile meeting of Face-of-God with his future love and wife in the wood (it is not wholly unlike the great scene of Lavengro with Isopel and the Flaming Tinman), his subsequent foregathering with Bow-may, where that lively damsel introduces herself in a friendly way by sending three arrows six inches each from his right ear, his left ear, and the top of his head, and the skirmish in the pass, where she saves his life. The old merit of Mr. Morris's work, both in prose and verse, its adjustment of literary and pictorial merit, appears throughout the book, and for our parts, if the painful critic had his due, and men of letters, instead of nitrate kings, became millionaires we would have a long gallery frescoed with scenes from The Roots of the Mountains and walk therein, not unaccompanied by that other herb Pantagruelion (the beneficent one, as hemp is the avenging), which the kindreds knew not, that we might behold with our eyes, as now with our minds, all these gracious things, not the least charm of which is that there be many excellent folk who cannot taste their graciousness at all.

OLD Plymouth in days long ago rejoiced in societies of White Friars, Grey Friars, and Black Friars, with a nunnery to boot. They have left their footprints behind them, with a page or so of by no means uninteresting history. Among other things spiritual and temporal, they seem to have left behind them some ideas which manifested themselves in the minds of a few Plymouth wits in this nineteenth century. In the year 1829 four gentlemen of Plymouth founded what they were pleased to call the Order of Blue Friars, to promote mutual enjoyment of the pleasures of this world, by meeting in conclave at each other's houses alternately once a quarter, and making merry after the manner of those times. A good plain dinner, wine, and talk, with a written paper to be read by each in his turn, was the entertainment provided by the rules of the fraternity. Some of them expended their wit in devising canons, costumes, and formalities, by way of affecting the manners and customs of the friars of old. The four brethren who originated this ingenious plan for their amusement consisted of—the Prior, Friar Tuck, William Jacobson, a lawyer of much wit and other accomplishments; the Sub-Prior, Friar Locke, George Wightwick, an architect, a really good talker, a wit, a great admirer of Shakspeare and the drama in general, a friend of Macready's, and a man much sought after for his entertaining qualities—these two were probably the ringleaders of the set; Friar Bacon, William Snow Harris, afterwards Sir William Harris, F.R.S., of lightning-conductor fame; and Friar Roger, T. Duncan Newton, who undertook the duties of sacristan. Afterwards the elder Charles Mathews, when on a visit to Plymouth, was elected one of the brethren under the name of Friar Prism; and one or two others became brethren, with the addition also of some lay brethren and even lay sisters.

Mr. Wright, who is the very efficient Librarian of the Plymouth Public Library, has done his best to dig up the remains of the Blue Friars buried in oblivion, and to describe this phase of wit prevalent in Plymouth half a century ago. But he found the Blue Friars were well nigh forgotten; only one or two persons had any remembrance of them whatever, and their records, kept, of course, in a blue book in a blue box, had disappeared. He has, however, searched them out, and has found some of the remains, which, with his description of the Order of Blue Friars and the brethren individually, make up the book before us. Brother Locke's (Wightwick's) written contributions appeared from time to time in Fraser, and some of these are reprinted here. There is also to be found some fair versification of the Friars, amongst, as might be supposed, a good share of doggerel. It is hardly necessary to say that Mathews was the shining light when he attended the conclaves, which could not be often; but, considering his powers, and those also of Jacobson and Wightwick, the fun must have been fast and furious, and of a very high order at times. No doubt the talk at the conclaves, as they chose to call them, was the best part of the festivity. No servants were allowed to be present when the conclave was sitting, and it is easy to imagine the boisterous uncontrolled wit, language being set free, which would flourish, when four or five intimate friends met together for the express purpose of abandoning themselves to unlicensed merriment. Talk is, after all, the bloom and sweetness of life, and it perisheth like a flower. It never can be reduced to writing by the aid even of the best of memories.

One of the most amusing of the papers published in this book is a description by Brother Roger—T. Duncan Newton—of a "Mathews at Home," at which he was present, given at the English Opera House, Strand, on the 6th June, 1822. The original bill of "Mr. Mathews at Home" is printed in full at p. 135, and the broad humour of the entertainment is well put before us. A paper by the same brother (p. 141) also gives some very amusing "Reminiscences of Lister." Sub-Prior Locke (Wightwick), a friend of Mathews, as he was of all players who visited Plymouth, contributed to Fraser's Magazine "My Acquaintance with Charles Mathews," reprinted here at p. 112, in which he describes the last illness and death of Mathews at Plymouth in the year 1835. At p. 123 Wightwick says:—

He was prohibited from much talking; but when his spirits were up it was as difficult for him to maintain silence as for us to wish him to do so. When suddenly checked by exhaustion or a paroxysm, he would say:—"There now; you leave me to do all the talking, while you all know that I ought not to speak. It's quite enough for me to get a word in edgeways. Now do talk to one another, there's good boys, and never mind me. Here H— [Harris], are not you and W— [Wightwick] opposed in politics? Say something to hurt his feelings, there's a good fellow; get up a political quarrel. It'll amuse me." "Bravo!" said Mathews, as he lay his length upon a sofa. "Go on, Harris; it's all right. He's getting savage. Hear! hear! à la lanterne! Rascals! Radicals! Robespierre! Keep it up! He's coming to the climax of personal violence."

Mathews lies buried in St. Andrew's Church, Plymouth, where there is a monument and an epitaph written by Wightwick to his memory.

The talk of the Blue Friars at their table, inspired by their repast before teetotallers were heard of, must have been far more sparkling than their writings, written in their studies (every house had its study in those days) before the hour of inspiration was upon them, and carried to the conclave in their pockets.

It is of the nature of such things that the Blue Friars did not enjoy a very prolonged existence as friars. They founded their Order in 1829, they met for the last time in 1846, and during those seventeen years forty-two conclaves were held. The canon to meet once a quarter was soon violated; wit and humour under such conditions is not long lived, its freshness wears off, it begins to lag, and it fades away into dull chatter. All the Blue Friars have gone the way of other friars, and Mr. Wright has undertaken the task of embalming their memory.

BATTLES AND ADVENTURES IN SOUTH AFRICA.*

"MAY they [the critics] have partaken of a comforting tiffin when they take in hand the mighty pen is the prayer" of Mr. Moodie, expressed in the preface to his second volume. As it happens, we are writing before the hour of that meal—few, we imagine, would care to court Mr. Moodie and indigestion immediately after it. In any case, we can assure him that no amount of tiffin, however comforting, would induce our "mighty pen" to praise this book. Mr. Moodie belongs to the class of writers—a growing terror—who send unsolicited copies of their works to members of the Royal Family and other distinguished people, and then print as an advertisement the replies wrung from the perplexity of these anguished celebrities. We learn from the extracts set out at the beginning of these volumes that the late Sir Bartle Frere held the ignorance of the public upon South African matters to be deplorable; also that Sir Theophilus Shepstone is of opinion that Mr. Moodie's work "will be most useful as a reference." With Sir Bartle Frere's statement we cordially agree; but we wonder if Sir Theophilus Shepstone has ever tried to hunt up a reference to any South African matter of history befalling between the reign of the late Pharaoh Necho and the year 1880 of our era in the unindexed sea of print and confusion which Mr. Moodie calls a book? Mr. Moodie is a poet as well as a historian, and we cannot refrain from passing on a little of the pleasure we have received from the verses prefixed to his first volume, entitled, "Adamastor, or The Titan Shape of the Mighty Cape." They begin:—

Of old the Titans, is (sic) unholy rage,
Waged impious war against the thunderer Jove;
And oft we've seen along the classic page
How—lightning armed—the "Cloud Compeller" hove
The rebels headlong down to earth, where still they strove

And so on; there is plenty more of it, but we will forbear to heave it headlong at a suffering public.

To come down to prose, that of Mr. Moodie is best illustrated by a sample; words fail us in which to describe it. Here is one, taken pretty well at hazard from the second page of his first volume:—

The dawn of the existence of this land of "Good Hope" among the shores within the scope of European genius and enterprise has been obscured by the darkness of its subsequent annals. The gloom and aspirations of the 15th century scarcely afford, in our minds, a subject of contemplation for the 19th, enveloped in its own busy schemes of to-day. There is in all our education, says the late Judge Watermeyer, an amazing negligence of the enquiry into our share of the philosophy of history. And yet what more glorious, what more worthy to be held forth to the admiration of men, than the spirit of that age, the interpretation of one whose thoughts was the discovery of the Cape of Good Hope?

Is such a style as this to be matched anywhere, even in America? Surely there is in all Mr. Moodie's education, says the present critic, an amazing negligence of the inquiry into his share of the philosophy of grammar! For the rest, we can only say this for the book; it is very long, and, to a great extent, composed of extracts from many works, documents, journals, &c., written by other people. In this collection sundry interesting facts are to be found; but, personally speaking, we should prefer to consult the various originals before Mr. Moodie had pounded them in his literary mortar. The only original matter of any real value in these pages is the general Chronology of African events appended to the second volume, which appears to have been compiled with some care.

THE BOOKWORM.†

THE second volume of The Bookworm—for such, from the pair of stars on the back, we presume it to be—is better than its title. It is a vagrant collection of gossip relating to books and bookmen; and such a collection, however unscientific in its execution, could scarcely fail to be readable. Now and then, indeed, the "personal equation" jars upon the reader, as when one of the writers gratuitously goes out of his way to brand Prior, Gay, and Butler as "miserable poetasters," which is neither relevant nor true. But the offences of this kind are few; and, making due allowance for certain limitations in the field explored, which seem to indicate that the writers are strongest in eighteenth-century literature, the volume is full of fine confused feeding. There is something of that famous newspaper, the Craftsman of Nicholas Amhurst, and of its printer, Richard Francklin, who, having helped to abuse Sir Robert Walpole, ended his days as the tenant at Twickenham of Sir Robert's youngest son; there are some interesting Swiftiana from the stores of Sylvanus Urban; there is a reprint from the Westminster Magazine of the communication of a correspondent who had visited Goldsmith at "the smoky, miserable, one-pair-of-stairs room" where he lived in Green Arbour Court; there is a curious contribution (from Brisbane) about that curious book, Barlow's Complete English Peerage; there is a chat about John Newbery, based upon Mr. Welsh, and a chat about Rowlandson, based upon Mr. Grego. Other noticeable articles are on the library at Wimborne Minster, with its memories of Prior; on Rymer and Dennis, by Mr. William Roberts; on Grangerism and Grangerites, by Mr. Laurence Hutton, and on the Trivial Poems and Triolets of Patrick Carey, by Mr. Gleeson White. A series of articles on "Bookworms of Yesterday and To-day" gives accounts of Mr. Bernard Quaritch, Richard of Bury, Mr. Chancellor Christie, Mr. R. S. Turner, Mr. H. S. Ashbee, and others. Many versicles on books, original and collected, are scattered through the pages of The Bookworm, some of which show that a genuine book-lover may make but an indifferent bard. Upon the whole, however, the volume has fewer longueurs et langueurs than most of its class, while many of its papers preserve items of out-of-the-way information which should be serviceable to that "great community of bibliocists, bibliophilists, bibliographers, biblioplists, bibliologists, bibliopegists," et hoc genus omne, to which one of its contributors refers.

THE POOR SISTERS OF NAZARETH.*

THE Sisters of Nazareth House could not possibly have had a more graceful or sympathetic advocate of their cause than Mrs. Alice Meynell, who pleads it with much earnest pathos. Nazareth House, Hammersmith, is one of the most interesting charitable institutions in the metropolis. It was founded, if we mistake not, by the late Cardinal Wiseman, and is intended as a home for the aged as well as for abandoned children. In short, the extremes of life are taken into this institution and cared for with a tender charity beyond praise. Nazareth House is distinctly not a workhouse. It is, to use Mrs. Meynell's charming phrase, "God's home for His poor." Aged people of both sexes are tended with a gentle thoughtfulness that can only spring from a sincere sentiment of true religion and appreciation of the duties of Christian charity. The forlorn old women who are admitted are called "the old ladies."

If there is one among them [says Mrs. Meynell] who has a beautiful face, in form or expression, the nuns do not fail to draw their visitors' attention to it; and some of these faces are most beautiful and spiritual. Even those who are suffering are peaceful; those who are passing into eternity without pain look like saints, pale, not with the difficulty of common life and poverty, but with seventy years of prayers.

All London contributes to the support of the Sisters, who are well-known at every great restaurant, club, and hotel, and there is not one of these immense caravanseries where they are not cordially welcomed, and from which they do not return with their carts well filled with scraps, which they convert into succulent and wholesome food for their "guests." We must not call the poor people at Nazareth House "paupers." "They are our guests and our friends," the good Sisters retort; and, whilst the old men and women, many of them verging on a hundred, are as clean and neat as it is possible for them to be made, and really seem to be enjoying the last few hours of their lives, the little children in the other wing of the house are being tended with motherly care. Each child is carefully dressed, not only in clean garments, but in pretty ones. There is no frock that is not gracefully made and gaily trimmed. The infinite variety of the odds and ends has a charming effect as regards the children, whose colouring has been studiously suited, and who have that look of having been separately and individually cared for which takes something from the melancholy of the sight of an orphan crowd. The White Lady who rose nightly from her grave, in the German legend, to wash and comb the little children ill tended need not walk the wards of Nazareth House. The dead and gone mothers whose little ones are there can rest in peace.

In addition to their internal work of the House, the Sisters have undertaken during the last few winters a soup-kitchen, which has brought several hundred starving people from all parts of London daily to their gates. The nuns rise to set on their caldrons at half-past four on the winter mornings. As it has often been hard to find the wherewithal, sometimes the inmates have voluntarily given up their share of the food to the outsiders—men cowering in the hard frost, and in some cases literally fainting from famine. Nineteen hundred persons, all told, have partaken of the hospitality of Nazareth House in a single day. The soup-kitchen is absolutely free. The Sisters found that, in the condition of the unemployed, it was best to put no obstacle, not even that of a ticket, in the way of approach to his daily food. No questions are asked of man, woman, or child. Only it was thought necessary to keep the charity for the unemployed by giving the soup a little before noon. Men at work were tempted to take advantage of a twelve-o'clock dole. As it is, the great number of men and the comparative fewness of the women and children are noticeable. On the intensely frosty mornings of midwinter ragged men are to be seen tramping westwards from distances whither it might have been thought the fame of Nazareth had never penetrated. They straggle out by twos and threes, starting early, and waiting before the door with its cross until the time arrives for them to be admitted. There is an exquisite etching in the book by Mr. Lambert representing a group of these outcasts taking their soup—an excellent olla podrida—at the foot of a life-sized crucifix. The nuns are seen doling out the broth in basins in a pleasant, good-natured manner. This is an impressive sight, which those who have witnessed it are never likely to forget. Indeed, a visit to Nazareth House is one which everybody should make at least once in a while. Strangers are heartily welcomed, and, home-returning, they will feel the wiser and the better for having witnessed so much goodness and so much distress.

CHRISTMAS BOOKS.

VI.

"ALL in the Downs" may be said to be the lyrical inspiration of Mr. W. Clark Russell's Betwixt the Forelands (Sampson Low & Co.), a delightful "longshore chat," rising at times to something like a chant of exultation, concerning the gallant deeds done in the past by the merchant service and Royal Navy in the wars with Holland, Spain, and France. From many sources, including the Naval Histories of Campbell and of James, Mr. Russell has collected his yarns of sea-fights, shipwrecks, smugglers, slavers, Deal boatmen, and so forth; and, however distant may be the scene of his story, he connects one and all in the most ingenious way with the Deal beach, the Downs, or the Goodwins. When he intervenes in his narration, it is as a chorus, accompanying the dramatic action, and his enthusiasm is irresistible. When he himself spins the yarn he holds us spell-bound, and we close his fascinating book with regret that there is not more of it, overrunning with good things though it be. Reading these stirring deeds of valour and seamanship, many of which are absolutely unknown to British boys and their fathers, it is impossible not to echo Mr. Russell's regret that naval histories are closed books to most schoolboys. "A pity it is, I think," says Mr. Russell, "that we, the inheritors of the greatness and glory for which such sailors as this" (Sir John Lockhart Ross) "fought, suffered, and bled, should know so little about them that the names of but a handful, so to speak, are familiar to us." And the pity is, it is too true. The ordinary histories tell of Howe and Jervis, of Blake and mighty Nelson, of decisive battles, and entirely neglect the long roll-record of individual gallantry in which our seamen and fisher-folk shine with the best. The story of the Topsham mate and boy who overpowered the French privateersman who had captured them, and that of the master of a fishing-smack who, with his crew of one man and a boy, engaged a French sloop well armed, and took her with her crew of fourteen in triumph into Poole Harbour, are the finest of all possible tonics in these days, and ought to be familiar to every boy in the land. Mr. Russell's book is, indeed, a book that was badly wanted. But, apart from this, it is admirable from all points of view. It embraces the wide field suggested to the writer at the outset, not neglecting the historic associations of the Kentish shore, and it is written in the most rousing and vivid style conceivable. Mr. Ballantyne is scarcely at his best in The Crew of the "Water Wagtail" (Nisbet), a story of Newfoundland in the opening of the sixteenth century. It is written in Mr. Ballantyne's later manner, which is a manner quite opposed to the spirit that lightens the pages of the Coral Island and its companions. The story is not lacking in incident. There are mariners, with little "salt" about them, a shipwreck, adventures with Indians, and so forth; but the attempt to recreate the colour and atmosphere of a rather remote period of history is anything but successful, and we are a good deal bored by a certain seaman who seems to have enjoyed an acquaintance with William Tyndale in his youth, and carries with him a MS. copy of St. John's Gospel, which he is never averse from producing for the instruction of his comrades. The comic man who serves as a foil for young heroes, has become a "property" common to most sea stories for boys. In Mr. Arthur Lee Knight's The Mids of the "Rattlesnake" (Ward, Lock, & Co.) he is a Dutchman, shipped on board a corvette at Cape Town, as the Captain's servant. His English is extraordinary, and he becomes the butt of the crew, one of whom provokes him to a combat at length. The two men had gone through the form of reconciliation at the Captain's request, when the Dutchman appeared one day with a black eye, which is accounted for by his antagonist declaring it was done in self-defence—"without so much as 'by your leave' he runs his starboard dead-light right agin my port fist!" Mr. Knight's book is full of rattling encounters with pirates in Malay waters and other pleasant adventures. Mr. John Hutcheson's comic man in The Black Man's Ghost (Ward, Lock, & Co.) is a negro cook, who is shot at by a Yankee skipper, falls overboard, is believed to be dead, but by a lucky chance gets aboard again and plays ghost and his pet banjo to the horror of captain and crew. Mr. Hutcheson's story is ingeniously planned and told with excellent spirit. It comprises a most exciting voyage from Liverpool round Cape Horn, a wreck on one of the Galapagos group, an earthquake, a buccaneer's treasure, and a very impressive finale.

* The Poor Sisters of Nazareth: an Illustrated Record of Life at Nazareth House, Hammersmith. By Alice Meynell. With Illustrations by George Lambert. London: Burns & Oates. 1889.

There seems to be a general revival of the late Mr. F. R. Goulding's books for boys this season. To those already noticed we must add Nucoochee (Routledge) and Sal-o-Quah (Routledge), the latter a story of a boy's life among the Cherokees. Both books we strongly recommend as wholesome and entertaining reading for the younger boys, and both are illustrated by W. J. Jackson in a style of uncommon vigour. Mr. Manville Fenn, whose stories we always hail with confident expectation of pleasure, has written nothing more exhilarating and interesting than his story of the Western Highlands, Three Boys (Griffith, Farran, & Co.). These three boys, who enjoy a glorious time on loch and moor, fishing, shooting, swimming, and so forth, are excellent fellows, though they offer the most whimsical contrasts. They are the young heir of the chief of the clan Mackhai, his youthful gillie, and a London boy visiting their Highland home, whose father is a solicitor and mortgagee of the Mackhai estates. The young Mackhai has no idea of his father's liability; yet at first he makes cruel sport in a good-humoured spirit of the sensitive, ignorant young Cockney, who ultimately becomes his fast friend and restores his home and lands to him in the end. The story is full of movement from first to last, and the descriptions of sport and scenery are excellent. In Esmé Stuart's Cast Ashore (National Society) the sea is scarcely an elemental circumstance, and the story, which is of a romantic cast, is better suited to children than active boys. It is skilfully built up, however, and told with the author's accustomed charm. The boy who will go to sea, and can learn nothing save aboard ship, is the hero whose brief yet exciting experience of sea life is well told by the author of Starwood Hall in Chris Derrick (National Society). Chris is a restless youth, dissatisfied with his peaceful home-life at a farm on the heights overlooking the Teign; but his ambition is soon quelled by a cruise in his father's schooner and the terrors of a mutiny. Perhaps he is too easily cured of his yearning for a merry life on the main.

Nothing so racy has been written of the plantation negro and his ways since Mr. Nelson Page's old Virginian stories appeared as the vivid and entertaining sketches of the negroes of Georgia and Florida in Two Runaways; and other Stories, by Harry Stillwell Edwards, illustrated by E. W. Kemble (New York: Century Company). "De Valley and De Shadder," "Two Runaways," and "Mina"—a Plot," are all capital character-sketches, and the Voodooism in the last is not the least singular illustration of an ineradicable superstition. But "Two Runaways" is the gem of the collection. The boyish delight of the old negro when he succeeds in luring his master into the swamps and backwoods to share his wild holiday is exquisitely painted. The remaining stories, in which the man of colour does not figure, are all good, and somewhat after the early manner of Mr. Bret Harte, though the pathos of Mr. Edwards is of a thinner quality than his humour and his descriptive power. Trying to find Europe, by Jimmy Brown, edited by W. L. Alden (Sampson Low & Co.), we find to be amusing only fitfully. The worst of it is, the humour is scarcely the humour of a boy, though it is a boy who tries to find, and succeeds in getting into, Europe. Here is a specimen:—"Paris is very crowded, and there are hundreds of people who can't get into the houses to eat their supper, and have to sit at little tables on the side-walks." Books for girls of all ages, save those not ascertainable, present no great variety, to judge from those before us. The most ambitious in aim is Dorothy Arden, by J. M. Callwell (Nelson & Sons), a story of the last Huguenot persecution; the scene partly in the South of France, and partly in England during the rebellion of Monmouth and the landing of William of Orange. At the opening the story moves rather slowly, tediously almost; but it becomes brisk indeed when the heroine and her small brother escape to England, meet their English kin, and share in exciting events. The characters in Mr. Callwell's book are well drawn, and a noble example is provided in the self-sacrifice and heroism of Humphry Gillott on the field of Sedgemoor. A useful moral is illustrated in Yours and Mine (Nisbet), a readable story for children by Anne B. Warner. Another story of the days of Sedgemoor and Judge Jeffreys is Fairmeadows Farm, by Mary H. Debenham (National Society); it is told in a pleasant style, is thoroughly interesting, and considerable care is shown in the historical treatment. The Three Geoffrys, by M. M. (Allen & Co.), is a dull example of the "family" story. It runs to much conversation, which is of the kind that very good people are delivered of, but not the less tedious for being in print. "A tale for boys" we should not recommend to our boys is Holding On, by J. T. Hopkins (Nelson). It is a moral tale and dull. When Mother was Little, by S. P. Yorke (Fisher Unwin), is a pretty story, told to children of the present day, of other days and another training than theirs, whether better or not being a question properly left undecided. Dora's Doll's House, by the Hon. Mrs. Greene (Nelson), is all about a disobedient little girl and her doll's house—a story that might have been told to better effect in one-fourth the space. Winter's Folly (Religious Tract Society) is one of Mrs. Walton's prettiest stories, unaffected in sentiment and simple in style. Mrs. Marshall, a practised hand at narrative, offers a good example of the story with a moral in Golden Silence (Nisbet), though less to our liking than the author's favourite style of romance with an historical flavouring.

Among magazine volumes and annuals we have to note Amateur Work (Ward, Lock, & Co.), with hundreds of illustrative diagrams, and practical articles on the production of useful or ornamental objects by artistic and mechanical processes; The Girl's Own Annual, the year's issue of that excellent journal The Girl's Own Paper; St. Nicholas, edited by Mary Mapes Dodge (New York: Century Company), the best of magazines for all sorts of children and charmingly illustrated; Little Folks (Cassell), deservedly a favourite with small children; The Child's Pictorial (S.P.C.K.), curiously styled "a monthly coloured magazine," full of pretty pictures in colour and capital stories by Mrs. Molesworth, and others; and The Children's Illustrated Annual (Seeley & Co.), a book to rejoice children who love animals, for it abounds in pictures of beasts wild and tame, pictures after Reynolds and Gainsborough, stories about dogs, birds, and so forth. The Child of the Caravan, by E. M. Green, with illustrations by Edith Scannell (Griffith, Farran, & Co.), is a painfully sad story of a gifted little boy who becomes separated from his parents and is trained as a violinist and ill treated in the training. From a large number of picture-books for the young we select The Lost Ticket (Routledge), a collection of stories in verse and prose, with pictures by A. W. Cooper, Hal Ludlow, and others; Where Lilies live and Waters wind away (Marcus Ward & Co.), verses by F. W. Bourdillon, illustrated by charming pictures in colour and vignettes in black and white by Edith S. Berkeley; The Kelpie's Fiddle-bow (Marcus Ward & Co.), a pretty story of the fantastic kind, from the German, with clever drawings by E. L. Shute; and Drifting Leaves, by Sarah Doudney (Marcus Ward & Co.), a volume of poems, with tasteful decorative designs in colour and gold, studies of autumn foliage for the most part, admirably reproduced. We have also to acknowledge Little Footsteps (Shaw & Co.), a collection of pleasing short stories, with good woodcuts, by Mrs. Shaw; Handsome is that Handsome does, readings for working-men's homes, written by various writers and well illustrated (Religious Tract Society); Chatterbox Christmas Box (Wells Gardner & Co.), with five chromos, and a variety of excellent short stories, illustrated by Mr. Stanley Berkeley; and the "Christmas Number" of The Monthly Packet, edited by Charlotte M. Yonge (Smith & Innes), with contributions by the editor and others. Something new in book "notions" is The Palette Painting Book (Warne & Co.), printed in Holland, as so many English books with coloured plates are. Cut to resemble a palette, the interior reveals an attractive series of pictures which are reversed in outline for children to colour. For young actors we have Fairy Rosebud, and Little Dewdrop and Jack Frost, by Amy Whinyates (Dean & Son), each with a charming design by Richard Doyle. They are perfectly suited to the means and capacity of young children.

FRENCH LITERATURE.

PRINCE LUBOMIRSKI is an amusing writer (1), and, in a way, a clever one; but it is very difficult to take him seriously, either when he is arguing that the Christian religion is done for, or explaining the unfortunate reasons which prevent him from having any country in particular, though he is more of a Frenchman than anything else. Hence, he is not quite the person from whom one would expect a grave history of the "political and social transformation of Europe" in the last half-century. However, he seems to have set to work on it with the greatest gravity, and has really done it (he begins in 1850) with considerable ability. The worst of it is that, even if the man were there, the hour has not come. It is a far cry from Prince Lubomirski to Thucydides; but it is even a farther from the clear and circumscribed events of the Peloponnesian war to the still unfinished welter of world history in the middle of which we are. Still fortune favours the brave, and Prince Lubomirski, in trying his actual adventure, shows himself a very brave man.

At the end of his discussion of literary artists (2)—to wit, Gautier, Baudelaire, "les deux Goncourt," M. Leconte de Lisle, Flaubert, M. de Banville, and a few younger contemporaries—M. Maurice Spronck admits calmly that he does not know whether there will be any letters or any arts in a short time, or whether "the old world will disappear" altogether. Meanwhile, he has some things worth saying on his special subject. We wish, indeed, that he had had the courage to leave out the everlasting and ever-boring MM. de Goncourt, the greatest literary impostors (we use the word, of course, in its sporting, not its moral, connotation) of the day. He has taken Gautier a little too seriously; by which we do not mean that he ranks him too high—that is not easy—but that he attaches too much importance to the Theophilite "indifference," on the one hand, and to Gautier's disgust at life and horror of death, on the other. Both existed and could not but exist in a man of temperament extraordinarily poetic, in the widest sense, who was all his life chained to the oar. But Théophile had too much sense, too much humour, too much cheery gallantry, to be the less fainéant René, the Amiel with more literary faculty, that M. Spronck sometimes seems to think him. On the other hand, the essay on Baudelaire comes perhaps nearer to the mark than that of any French critic, and the Flaubert is also good. There is specially to be commended in the volume what is most rare in French critics—the attempt not to connect the subject with a theory, not to hop and skip about it saying clever things, but to grapple with it as it is, and take the measure of it, and make a literary preparation of it, showing its real nature. And this attempt may atone for some defects of style, and for occasional charge in certain directions.

We took up M. Secrétan's book (3) with certain sinkings of heart, and we cannot say that we laid it down in much of a mood to say "Sursum corda." It is written in a good enough spirit; but appears to us almost, if not quite, as unpractical as most writing on the subject—which is saying a great deal. That social states can be destroyed, but cannot be made; can be hampered, but not set going, is the beginning and end of the whole matter; and you cannot make a big book out of that.

It is really a pity that Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth of Roumania, who has a pretty talent, should, by choice or by accident, be found so much surrounded by the ignoble army of puffers. Here are some very fair stories of hers (4), which are pretty in French, and perhaps were prettier in German. And they must needs be ushered by a prefatory blast of flattery from the pen of the eminent brother-in-arms of My Brother Yves—a blast which might have stunned Gloriana herself. "Parfaite harmonie," "éternelle jeunesse," "charme unique de son regard," "suprême intelligence," "dessins archaïques qui semblent sortir tout naturellement de ses doigts." Thus writes M. Pierre Loti. "Des phrases entières de la reine [lui] reviennent en mémoire avec leurs inflexions doucement musicales." When she read his books "je ne reconnaissais plus mon œuvre, tant elle me paraissait embellie, transfigurée." "Carmen Sylva lisant elle-même ses propres œuvres est la seule personne qui avec une fiction m'ait jamais ému jusqu'à me faire pleurer." Thus, and much else, does the author of Madame Chrysanthème write concerning his heroine, though "il s'est borné à tourner autour de son sujet trop profond." Dear! dear!

We have before us two of the numerous books on military life which have been begotten by the turning of the French nation into an army. One—M. Descaves' Sous-Offs (5)—is a novel of the grimy type of which we have noticed not a few of late years—a type certainly not testifying to any great enjoyment of or respect for the soldier's life among the Frenchmen who now know so much more of it than they did. The other (6) is a very different book, containing, apparently, genuine military reminiscences. These are not rose-coloured by any means—indeed they are quite the contrary—but the author was born long before the days of naturalism and in those of romance. Saumur, the ranks of cavalry regiments, Martinique—M. Mismar sketches them all with little pretension, but with a just hand.

NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

THE new annual volume of the Art Journal (Virtue & Co.), a handsome gift-book, as usual, shows a good record of the year's art, including a comprehensive review, with illustrations, of artistic work at the Paris Exhibition, a contribution which is the only feature of the present volume that recalls the original form of the Art Journal. The enlarged scope of the "New Series," commenced ten years since, is especially noteworthy this year, both in the letterpress and in illustrations. The former possesses the brightness and diversity necessary to a popular undertaking, and decidedly not characteristic of the periodical's youth; while, in the place of the line-engravings of old, we have etchings, wood-engravings, chromos, photo-engravings, and other examples of reproductive processes. The prints in colour, after water-colours by Ludwig Passini and Miss Maude Goodman, though fair specimens of chromolithography, must be classed with "Christmas-number" art, and may be said to carry the changed order of the Art Journal quite as far as it is desirable. Pictorial art may be popularized in other directions, and with more gratifying results. The etchings and photogravures, for instance, in the new volume comprise some excellent examples—Mr. F. Morgan's "School Belles," by Mr. Muller; Mr. Waterhouse's "Lady of Shallott," by Mr. Macbeth Raeburn; Mr. Percy Robertson's "Harrow"; "The Knight's Dream," after Raphael, by Mr. J. Groh; and, among photogravures, a Highland landscape by Mr. H. W. R. Davis, and Mr. Solomon's "Niobe." The text illustrations to Mrs. Meynell's capital paper on the Newlyn fraternity, to Professor Stevenson's sound critical article on Corot, to Lady Colin Campbell's "Frank Holl and his Works," and Mrs. Sitwell's interesting series of papers on "Types of Beauty," exemplify the general excellence of the pictorial section. The wide field embraced by the literary contributions is revealed by citing a few of the illustrated articles—such as Mr. Henry Wallis on antique glass at the Naples Museum, Mr. W. J. Loftie's historical papers on the Royal Palaces, Mr. Claude Phillips on the work of Jean-Paul Laurens and Fritz von Uhde, and Mr. J. E. Hodgson's interesting retrospective account of the Royal Academy in its earlier years.

Mr. Wilfrid Blunt, in A New Pilgrimage; and other Poems (Kegan Paul, Trench, & Co.), puts forth his views of the sonnet, as a poem and a metrical form, both by precept and example, and we find not a little that may well engage the student of poetry in his theory and practice of the sonnet. With Mr. Blunt's plea for perfect freedom in rhyme-arrangement, the octave of the sonnet being assumed to be inflexible, we are in complete agreement. Nor are we disposed to urge aught against his partiality for a concluding couplet. The order of rhyming the sextett of the sonnet is one of those wholly trivial matters that may well be left to distressed pedants. The example of all the masters of the English sonnet is against any fixed rule. The two greatest sonnet-writers of the century, Wordsworth and Keats, showed a delightful contempt for Italian form. Wordsworth, for example, composed a sonnet of three rhymes only, and it is one of his finest. But when Mr. Blunt interferes with the structure of the sonnet, as he does in his series, "The Idler's Calendar," we protest he is nothing but rash. His sonnet of sixteen verses, or "lines," as he prefers it, is not a sonnet at all, and does not accord with his own "metrical description of a perfect English sonnet," which runs thus:—

Oh, for a perfect sonnet of all time!
Wild music, heralding immortal hopes,
Strikes the bold prelude. To it from each clime,
Like tropic birds on some green island slopes,
Thoughts answering come, high metaphors, brave tropes,
In ordered measure and majestic rhyme.
And, presently, all hearts, of kings and popes,
And peoples, throb to this new theme sublime.
Anon, 'tis reason speaks. A note of death
Strengthens the symphony yet fraught with pain,
And men seek meanings with abated breath,
Vexing their souls—till lo! once more the strain
Breaks through triumphant, and Love's master voice
Thrills the last phrase, and bids all joys rejoice.

The model, perhaps, is as curious as the examples that follow it. Mr. Blunt's sixteen-line sonnet is really only the first step towards that once-popular poetic exercise the "storied sonnet" of the author of the Mysteries of Udolpho. There is no reason why you should not arrive at eighteen, or twenty-four, lines, or stay at that. Frankly, Mr. Blunt does much better in his experiments in assonance "From the Arabic," in his lay of the dying bullfighter "Sancho Sanchez," and in the musical stanzas "Across the Pampas."

Metrical form again appeals to the reader of the Rev. Richard Wilton's Benedicite; and other Poems (Wells Gardner, Darton, & Co.), a volume of sonnets, rondeaux, ballades, and translations from the Latin poems of Crashaw, Herbert, and others, prefaced by a pleasant exculpatory rondeau by Mr. Austin Dobson. Mr. Wilton's fluent and sympathetic setting of the "Song of the Three Children" is in a metrical form which Mr. Blunt may regard as a sonnet in octosyllabics, though the author does not so regard them. His true sonnets follow Petrarch's form, show Wordsworthian influence at times, and are for the most part singularly free from the artifice begotten of the mere effort to rhyme which imperils the spontaneity of most English sonnets of orthodox form. The rondeaux charm even more by their unpremeditated air; song that is truly lyrical and of genuine inspiration. Such an example as "The Sylvan Shrine" (p. 80) might have evoked Mr. Dobson's address to the author on the rondeau, as employed in a previous volume:—

Let none its dainty charm abuse
From this time forth, and none accuse,
As once, its bird-like blithe refrain
Of naught but idle themes again,
Since for a graver song you use
This Gallic form!

Edward Thring, Teacher and Poet (Fisher Unwin), is a little volume of addresses, sonnets, and recollections, by Mr. H. D. Rawnsley, commemorative of the late Head-Master of Uppingham, and reprinted in part from the Spectator. An éloge of the kind here set forth is scarcely matter for criticism. The work of the late Mr. Thring as an educational trainer may be more effectually discussed when the forthcoming biography appears; but Mr. Rawnsley's rather gushing estimate of his poetry, of which ample specimens are given, must have been entirely prompted by the writer's admiration of the schoolmaster, since Mr. Thring's muse shows nothing but an ordinary quality of versifying and some acquaintance with the poetry of Wordsworth.

An entertaining little book, not more egotistic than the occasion warrants, is Mr. Richard Tangye's autobiography, "One and All" (Partridge & Co.), originally contributed in part to the British Workman. One needs not to be engaged in hydraulic engineering to read this story of a remarkable career with considerable interest. The story is simply yet forcibly told, and its dramatic incidents are decidedly striking.

Compiled by the Bishop of St. Andrews is The Waverley Proverbial Birthday Book (Remington & Co.), a collection of brief extracts from Sir Walter, well chosen, though by no means exhaustive of the subject, as the Bishop's appendix of shorter proverbial sayings from the novels proves. It is a little odd that the compiler of these sententious extracts should begin his preface with this tautology, "Among the many other and more striking merits by which the Waverley Novels are distinguished," &c.

A second instalment—"Chapter II," it is entitled—of the Hon. Mrs. Burrell's Thoughts for Enthusiasts at Bayreuth (Pickering & Chatto) comprises an essay on the Memoirs of the Princess Wilhelmina of Prussia, Margravine of Bayreuth, with a bibliography, facsimiles of handwriting, portraits, and an excellent biographical sketch. The book is handsomely got up.

From the Subodha-Praka'sa Press of Bombay we have received Mr. Manilal Nabhubhai Dvivedi's Monism or Advaitism? an introduction to the Advaita philosophy "read by the light of modern science." The same writer's Siddhanta-Sāra (Nirnaya-Sagara Press), "a History of Thought in India, with an attempt to point out the basis of a universal religion," with a synopsis in English, from which it appears that the author discovers the Advaita philosophy underlying all religions, and itself a reconciling medium between religion and modern science.

More than one volume has reached its third edition in England alone. . . . Each volume is written by one of the most foremost English authorities on the subject with which it deals. . . . 1. A CONSPIRACY of SILENCE. By G. COLMORE, Author of "Concerning Oliver Knox." 2 vols.

The FIRST REVIEW (St. James's Gazette).—"Powerful and painful, cleverly written and deeply interesting.....a study of insanity; a clever study, but inevitably morbid..... A strong book, certainly, but not suitable for weak nerves."

The SECOND REVIEW (Glasgow Herald).—"We can speak in terms of unqualified approval of it....The work of a true literary artist....A weird and intensely interesting tale."

The THIRD REVIEW (Saturday Review).—"This very clever and very painful book.... This [what precedes] is very high praise, but the author deserves high praise."

The FOURTH REVIEW (Literary World).—"We unhesitatingly pronounce it to be an excellent novel, and thoroughly interesting from beginning to end."

The SECOND REVIEW (Athenaeum).—"A most valuable work. It contains one of the most interesting accounts of the Bosomil heresy that we have met with.....Profusely illustrated. The drawings will be found of considerable importance."

THE PORTFOLIO:

An Artistic Periodical.

Edited by P. G. HAMERTON, Esq.

Published Monthly, price Half-a-Crown.

THE PORTFOLIO, having now nearly completed the twentieth year of its existence, the Editor and Publishers have decided to take the beginning of the year 1890 as a convenient opportunity for the introduction of several important improvements.

The text will be printed in a larger and handsomer type. The double columns will be abolished, except in the case of the ART CHRONICLE, which will be so paged that when the volume is bound it can be placed consecutively at the end.

The new page will afford opportunities for the introduction of ornamental initial letters (which the narrow column did not admit), headpieces and tailpieces, copied from good examples, or expressly designed. As it will contain somewhat less matter than before, the number of pages will be proportionately increased.

Among the Papers which will appear during the Year may be mentioned:—

PORTUGUESE FILIBUSTERING.

FILIBUSTER rhymes to bluster, and there may have been a certain tendency in a small part of the English press to magnify the importance of Major SERPA PINTO's recent raid on the Makololo. We certainly shall neither set nor follow the example of any such magnifying here. In itself the incident did not, apparently, differ from many incidents in the travels, say, of Mr. STANLEY. You go about in a kind of No-man's-land with, according to some Portuguese testimony, two thousand negroes; you meet with persons who do not manifest an eager welcome to two thousand negroes, even when headed, as the song says, by "one Portugee"; you endeavour to teach them better tastes and manners with Gatlings and Winchesters; several of them die, and the rest run away. It is a "scientific expedition," of course. (Everything of the kind is a scientific expedition nowadays, from the Mountains of the Moon to the Roof of the World.) Its object is to establish a railway, or survey for one. It had been thought that Portugal's method of constructing railways in territory which is, or which she holds to be, hers was to get somebody else to spend the money, and then to confiscate the line; but, apparently, there is more variety in Portuguese ideas than this. There is no need to grudge this variety; there is only need to take care that Portugal benefits not one jot by it. Until fuller intelligence of a certain kind has been received, it must remain uncertain what satisfaction ought to be demanded for the acts of the Major with the famous travelling name, if they have really been committed. But, whatever this may turn out to be, nothing that has happened can possibly affect, except by further enforcing it, the necessity of standing by Lord SALISBURY'S clear declaration that England has not admitted, does not admit, and will not admit, Portuguese claims to the Nyassa and Shiré districts and to the banks of the Upper Zambesi.

Even in the need of consolation accompanying that fit of uneasiness which frequently succeeds the commission of a deed of derring-do which the doer is by no means certain of being able to make good, the encomiums of a certain portion of the French press will hardly be very grateful to Portuguese hearts. In the first place, unless the two chief European nations which have hitherto abetted the slave trade should haply make common cause to maintain it in the Mozambique Channel, it is clear that French sympathy with Portugal must be of the most unpractical description. France has no possessions on the mainland of Africa to the south of the Congo State, and if the worst comes to the worst, there is hardly any conceivable manner in which she is likely to help Portugal. The most purblind Portuguese patriot must perceive that these good friends, to borrow MACAULAY'S jest, do not sympathize with the bear, but object to the pleasure of those who bait him; or, in other words, could be quite content to see Portugal lose, if only England did not gain. Nor is it likely that any Portuguese who considers the matter coolly will find much further comfort in the alleged wickedness of Mr. JOHNSTON in distributing British flags after obtaining Portuguese safe-conducts, or in the terrible acts which "the British subject JOHN PETIT" and others, especially missionaries, have done at Blantyre and elsewhere. Mr. JOHNSTON is a servant of the English Crown, and the English Crown, by its responsible Ministers, has repeatedly declared that it recognizes no Portuguese sovereignty in the districts where Mr. JOHNSTON effected his distribution. And as for the crimes of British subjects and missionaries, probably no European Power, if it is to be made responsible for the acts of its subjects in this way, is worthy to hold or to protect a foot of African territory. Moreover, if it were not that we do not care for the use of harsh language, we should have to remark a little effrontery in the use of such an argument just after Major SERPA PINTO's Gatlings have done such wonders with the Makololo. The African Lakes Company, and the Blantyre missionaries, and the naughty "British subject JOHN PETIT," and all the rest of them, would have taken a very long time to make up, even if they were all as murderous as Portuguese imagination paints them, a butcher's bill equal to the Major's expenditure of Makololo as an incident of railway surveying.

Public opinion in Portugal is said to be calm, but determined; there is no reason whatever why public opinion in England should not be equally determined the other way, and still calmer. On last Monday night it so happened that the two Law Officers of the Government both addressed public meetings, and, while Sir EDWARD CLARKE deprecated excessive denunciation of Portugal, Sir RICHARD WEBSTER took credit to the Government for having "no Majuba Hill" to their names. They have not, and we all hope that the word Swaziland, which occurs to the mind with an unpleasant persistence, will never spell anything similar. But, if they are not to have it, or something of the kind, there must be absolutely no attempt to transact in any way on this subject of Portuguese claims in the interior. It is important to notice that, with all the calmness and deliberation attributed to Portugal, there is also attributed to her by those Englishmen who, after the eccentric fashion of our nation, take the side of the enemy, and who affect to be acquainted with Portuguese intentions, a desire to compromise. The sea-to-sea pretension is, it is said, to be abandoned; Matabele—if not Mashona—land to be kindly recognized as a British sphere; and a certain gap northwards left between the Portuguese provinces. It is almost a sufficient answer to say that, if the Portuguese really take this position, "the bonny Empire of Monomotapa, which has been in the family these three hundred years, is," to use the words of the elder Mr. MORTON of Milnwood, "barking and fleeing" already. The main Portuguese pretension is gone, and the Portuguese are simply reduced to exactly the same ground or claim as that put forward by England, the claim of occupation and the like. In this respect, as regards the Nyassa and Shiré districts, it is well known that they have absolutely nothing to set against the claims of the British merchants and missionaries who have (or had till the other day, when the attacks of the Arabs on the north and the Portuguese on the south endangered it) an undisputed and undisturbed record of years. And it is not pretended, but the contrary, that the Portuguese have in their projected compromise abandoned the intention of disestablishing these British subjects whom they have for some time past done their best to annoy. Fortunately, moreover, the declarations of the FOREIGN SECRETARY already referred to contained the most explicit reference to these districts, while the charter of the British South African Company is a document in reference to the other regions concerned which cannot be neglected or dropped without loss and disgrace. Until we have proper official intelligence, it is of course impossible to pronounce in confidence on the details of the matter. Mr. JOHNSTON'S whereabouts are not exactly known, it seems, but it is pretty certain that, unless some untoward accident happens, he will be able to put the whole matter in a clear light. Mr. JOHNSTON is not only a practised African traveller, but he has had experience of diplomatic transactions of various delicate kinds, and he has no prejudice against the Portuguese—indeed they have themselves cited his testimony in their favour. But, if the facts are anything at all resembling the report of them, it is particularly desirable that public opinion should be fortified beforehand against the "anti-

"Jingo" nonsense which is already being uttered, and against the silly taunts of French and Irish newspapers about hitting a man your own size. Weakness should be an additional protection against unjust aggression by the stronger; but it is no sort of warrant for presumptuous insolence and outrage on the weakling's part; and those who attempt to plead it, either for themselves or others, in effect admit that the accused has nothing else to plead. Certain detailed threats which have been made in England are unwise, because the offence is not as yet clearly detailed or proved. It is sufficient to say that Portugal is conspicuously destitute of that shield of inaccessibility which has emboldened some other nations to take liberties with England, and that an equivalent, and something more than an equivalent, for any wrongdoing of hers in the interior would be particularly easy to exact on the coast. Above all and before all, no arbitration should be thought of. Unpleasant experience has shown that where England is concerned arbitration is impossible.

MR. BOUVERIE.

THE death of Mr. BOUVERIE would not, in any circumstances, have counted as an event. It is now little more than a piece of news. Nevertheless, though not much more, it is yet something more. It is a reminder that a class of men once existed in the House of Commons who now, very much to its disadvantage and that of the country, have disappeared from it, and do not seem likely to find their way into it again. The constituencies are as careless as Lord TENNYSON long ago discovered Nature to be of the individual life, and they are not more careful than he on reflection found that Nature was of the type. Mr. BOUVERIE was almost the last of the members of Parliament who, in the special sense which the phrase has now lost, were Parliament-men, who represented the House of Commons in the House of Commons itself, who were the guardians and interpreters of its rules, the spokesmen of it in its collective capacity, the vigilant watchmen of its corporate self-respect and of its traditions. He was more than the member for a particular constituency or the adherent of a party. He sustained on the Liberal side of the House the position which Colonel WILSON PATTEN had among the Conservatives, and which Mr. WHITBREAD gave some promise of filling among Liberals until unhappily he Gladstonized and demagoguized.

It is a mistake to speak of Mr. BOUVERIE as if he were merely an old Whig survival, a sort of fossilized remnant of the aristocratic party of GREY and GRENVILLE. His father, the Earl of RADNOR, had been the friend and patron of COBBETT; as Lord FOLKESTONE he had been in the House of Commons a Radical before the days of Radicalism, and in the Lords he had rivalled the reforming zeal of Lord DURHAM. He was one of the four or five peers—Lord FITZWILLIAM, Lord DUCIE, and Lord KINNAIRD were the others, and almost the only others—who were Free-Traders before Mr. COBDEN and the League. When Mr. BOUVERIE first stood for Kilmarnock in 1844, a young man of five or six and twenty, the Repeal of the Corn Laws, though actually near at hand, did not seem to be near at hand. Famine, which, as Mr. BRIGHT once said in a public speech, and, as often as he could find opportunity for dropping in the phrase, in conversation, had not yet come to the aid of its foes. The Edinburgh letter of Lord JOHN RUSSELL had not been written. Mr. BOUVERIE stood for Kilmarnock as an economical Radical of the school of Mr. VILLIERS and Mr. COBDEN, reciprocating civilities with his Chartist opponent, Mr. HENRY VINCENT, and minimizing his differences with him. He had a subordinate office in Lord JOHN RUSSELL's first Government, as did Mr. VILLIERS and, for a time, Mr. MILNER GIBSON, and was held at that time to be rather more of a Radical than a Whig. He had no place in Lord ABERDEEN's Administration, receiving instead that post of consolation, the Chairmanship of Committees. Under Lord PALMERSTON's first Government he was in succession Vice-President of the Board of Trade and President of the Poor-Law Board. His official career came to an end in 1858, for in subsequent Liberal Ministries he had no place. He declined, in Lord PALMERSTON's second Administration, a post which he believed to be below his political standing, and insensibly assumed the position of candid friend on the fourth bench, behind and above the successive Ministries of Lord PALMERSTON, Lord RUSSELL, and Mr. GLADSTONE. Though a man of considerable business capacity, as he showed in the unpaid offices of Church Estate Commissioner and Ecclesiastical Commissioner, and, after his retirement from Parliament, in connexion with various City Companies, his habit of mind was essentially critical. He discharged, with a certain liking for it, the valuable but unpopular function of canvassing the conduct of the leaders of his party, when in office, not from the point of view of an antagonist, but of a friendly and dispassionate observer accidentally left out of their arrangements. The work is a very useful one, but it is attended with a certain degree of friction. When it became necessary to inform Lord JOHN RUSSELL, after his unfortunate Vienna mission, that a large section of the Liberal party could not oppose the vote of censure on him, of which Sir EDWARD BULWER LYTTON had given notice, Mr. BOUVERIE was chosen, by a certain instinct of natural selection, as the person who would probably be best pleased to perform this disagreeable office. Mr. BOUVERIE was the reverse of an ill-natured man, but there are certain people to whom the discharge of a painful duty gives a real satisfaction.

Mr. BOUVERIE's relations with his party, uneasy in the later days of Lord PALMERSTON and Lord RUSSELL, were strained to the verge of rupture under Mr. GLADSTONE. This is not the place in which to revive the record of battles not more worthy of memory than those of cawing rooks about the nests which they guard or pilfer. The conflicts had their source in the antipathetic characters of the two men. Since he had held the office of Chairman of Committees, Mr. BOUVERIE had given a large part of his attention to the inner business of the House, and to those arrangements which are essential to its satisfactory management. The first condition of the smooth working of the Parliamentary machine is a readiness to come to a definite understanding, and fidelity in adhering to it. To a man of Mr. BOUVERIE's habit of mind, the over-subtlety of interpretation which Mr. GLADSTONE showed in the Ewelme Rectory business and in the COLLIER appointment suggested a duplicity of intelligence which did not revolt him the less for being unconscious. He would probably have held with that "most generous of Ultramontanes, WARD"—surely the most prosaic line ever "hitched into rhyme," to use a phrase of Mr. BROWNING's, more frequently applicable to his own performances than to Lord TENNYSON's—that when you have once made up your mind that deception is justifiable, you had better then lie like a trooper. The tactics which combine the moral credit of speaking the truth with the advantage of leaving a false impression, and the self-applause at having done a clever thing, revolted him. Mr. BOUVERIE, indeed, with his sense that the first duty of man is to the House of Commons, would probably not have admitted that it can ever be justifiable to deceive it. Still, if he had had to make his choice, he would most likely have preferred Mr. WARD's casuistry, which seems also to be that of Mr. PARNELL, to Mr. GLADSTONE's.

Mr. BOUVERIE was, in a legitimate way, somewhat of a formalist. To cut the knot of a controversy between the Houses by the invocation of an obsolete prerogative, as when purchase in the army was abolished by Royal Warrant, seemed to him a questionable proceeding. One of the precepts of the Rabbinical teachers insists on the necessity of what they call "fencing the law"—that is to say, of laying down subsidiary regulations which should prevent its unheeding or impulsive infringement. The Jewish ritual not only fenced the law, but fenced the fences of the law, and again the fences of the fences of the fences. Mr. BOUVERIE had a similar regard for the Parliamentary forms which guarded the substance of law and freedom, and if he occasionally pushed his reverence for them into pedantry, it was a pedantry wiser than contemptuous disregard of them. But for his collisions with his party, Mr. BOUVERIE would probably have been nominated Speaker of the House of Commons on the retirement of Mr. DENISON. Lord HOLLAND used to say that, among all the Speakers he had known, only one was a really able man—WILLIAM GRENVILLE—and he was the only bad Speaker of the lot. Mr. BOUVERIE was an able man, and he might have turned out a bad Speaker. Instead of succeeding to the Chair, he lost and did not regain his place in the House of Commons. Lord MELBOURNE predicted that the decline of personal independence would be one of the ultimate consequences of Parliamentary Reform. The rejection of Mr. BOUVERIE by the electors of the group of Scotch boroughs which he had served for thirty years, because he declined to bow down to the political idol of the day, was an early symptom of what is now an epidemic malady.

TRADES-UNIONS.

IN so far as it is a reason for satisfaction that the Gas-Workers' Union should have been beaten at the expense of great labour, considerable cost, and some risk, the result of the so-called strike in South London has been all that could be wished. Thanks, we take it, very largely to the good generalship of Mr. LIVESEY, the South Metropolitan Gas Company has, up to the present, won all along the line. It has obtained all the men needed to replace those who were docile enough to quarrel with a good employment at the dictation of the Union Committee. As might have been expected, no great difficulty has been found in training the new hands to do the necessary work. The Company retained the services of its officers and of a body of experienced men. It is as true of industrial as it is of military organization that, with good officers and a percentage of trained men, it is no very difficult task to lick recruits into shape. This is particularly the case when the recruits are as willing to learn as the new servants of the South Metropolitan Company obviously are. The disappointment which the discovery that their business is no impossible one to acquire quickly has caused the Gas-Workers' Committee is only one more proof of the utter want of foresight and common-sense and the abounding conceit it has displayed throughout the whole struggle. Up to now, also, the Company has been able to obtain the coal, which is as necessary to it as men, and there is a good prospect that it will be able to defy the Coal-Porters' and the Seamen and Firemen's Union as effectually as it has the Gas-Workers'. All this as far as it goes is well. It is not, however, so well that the victory should have been won by measures which may be called military, without any violent straining of metaphor. To read of the care which has been taken to victual the South Metropolitan Gas Works, of the display of force which has been required to protect the newcomers on their way through the streets, of the strategical movements and surprise tactics which have been required to bring the recruits in without a riot, is to read of something not very remotely resembling the preliminaries of street-fighting. We know that only gross misconduct in high places could cause things to come to so serious a pass; but it is undeniable that there is fear of violence on one side, only too well justified by recent experience, and on the other a predisposition to use violence, which has been only too disgracefully encouraged. The measures for their own protection which have been forced on some of the Company's old hands are in themselves a condemnation of this so-called fight for the liberty of British workmen. When the gas-workers were called out, several of them repented at the last moment, but did not dare to say so. They made up their bundles, took their money, and then ran to cover within the works, where they lay in hiding till the "strikers" were gone. Then they came out and took the Company's terms. The facts of the case are clear enough, in all conscience, in all this dispute, but none of them are clearer than that these men were under the influence of fear, inspired by their own professed friends, and that it was fear of violence. A more disagreeable proof of the spirit which prevails among many of the working class, of the disposition to bully on one side and the want of courage on the other; a more scandalous piece of evidence of the little confidence felt in the capacity of the official protectors of the public to do their duty, has seldom been given in this or any other country.

It is no longer necessary to insist that all this dispute, and the still enduring kindred dispute at Erith in the Maxim-Nordenfeldt works, are, in fact, fights for power. On one side are the employers and those workmen who choose to remain free, in fact, and not in the Trade-Union sense; on the other are the committees of the Unions. These bodies have manifestly been encouraged by the submissiveness of the men, which has now become a habit, and by the "sympathy" of a portion of the public, to attempt to dictate, not only to the employers, but to the whole community. It was hardly necessary that Mr. CHAMPION should come forward to tell us what is to be the nature of labour politics. His letter has a value which we do not deny, as showing that a portion of the masses has thoroughly grasped the Gladstonism of Mr. GLADSTONE. Neither can it be denied that he shows a shrewd appreciation of the moral courage and intellectual honesty of the common or Caucus candidate. No doubt the labour party will imitate the tactics of kindred spirits in the teetotal and promotion-of-syphilis parties, and, like them, they will secure the services of candidates. But we knew that already, and, knowing it, have quite understood the nature of the labour party, so called. The one way to counteract its manœuvres is to make their real character plain, and form an opposition which will be strong enough to prop the candidate up on the other side. As things are going we see no reason why that opposition should not be formed if there is found among those whose interest it is to form it only half the sense, the foresight, and the spirit which has been shown by Mr. LIVESEY. It is now becoming so plain as to be obvious to many workmen themselves that the Unions are ceasing to exist for the sake of the workers, and are beginning to exist for the sake of the committees. Habit, tradition, distrust of the employer, and an ingrained belief that only the exercise of their own power in combinations will secure for them consideration or fair treatment (which distrust and belief are, we frankly allow, largely justified by experience), still unite to make the men stand by their Union committees. The influence of these bodies is great, and even deservedly great. Therefore they can still rely on prompt and implicit obedience from a very large part of the working class. But it is a power which is necessarily based, in the last resort, on moral influence and on interest, and is very capable of being lost by abuse. It is being abused and the natural consequence should follow. Men may for a time allow themselves to be misled or overawed, but after a while loss and discomfort will bring them to their senses. As soon as the malcontents are sufficiently numerous to encourage one another, as soon as they find a leader, there will be a revolt. It is the manifest interest of the employer to supply the encouragement and the leader, as Mr. LIVESEY has done. The Gas-Workers' Union has played his game. The Amalgamated Society of Engineers, the Dock-Strikers' Committee, the Coal-Porters', and the Seamen and Firemen's Union, are indirectly doing nearly as much for him. Their mere management, to begin with, is ruinously bad. Nothing could possibly be more ill advised than the piteous appeal which the Gas-Workers' Union and the Coal-Porters' have been already compelled to make to the charity of the public, which they are doing their best to deprive of one of the most necessary of necessities. It is a confession to the men who have followed or may follow them that there is no help in them at need. Then the ridiculous attempt to create sympathy by mere mechanical imitation of the dockers' processions is too transparent. The efforts of one Union to tyrannize over another, as in the case of the effort of the London Seamen's Union to dictate to the Sunderland men, are excellently well adapted to set workmen against workmen. The prompt failure of the last effort to make trouble in the docks, following on the defeat of the Silvertown strike, has shaken the influence of Messrs. MANN and TILLET. The threat of the Shields men to disturb the trade of London, and the manifest risk that the coal-porters' attack on Lord DURHAM's ships may injure the business of the port—all these and some similar lessons are producing a cumulative effect. The men who might be induced to strike are losing heart, the community which is threatened is losing sympathy. Between the two it seems daily more likely that the Unions will fail to secure any further support.

But little permanent good will be done unless these errors in tactics on the part of the Unions serve to make the workmen realize the selfishness of their policy as a whole. It would be unfair to say that the Unions have no case at all. We do not think that they have a good one; but they certainly have a case which is capable of defence. It is at least an arguable proposition that the workingmen, as a class, will be better off if they keep to a system of short engagements, which leaves them free to act at any moment as they think best for their interests. Long engagements, even though accompanied by such a recognized right to share in profits as is granted by Mr. LIVESEY, do to some extent limit the liberty of the workman. The loss would, indeed, be well compensated by the gain; nor is it at all apparent that workmen would be the worse off for putting themselves, as regards the length of their engagements, on the same footing as many classes of educated clerks and public servants. Still it is open to the workmen to think otherwise; and if the Union committees had argued their side of the question with some regard for truth and courtesy, if they had even persuaded the Unions to forbid their members to accept such terms as Mr. LIVESEY's, they might have been ill advised, but they would have been within their rights. There has, however, been no attempt at fairness, persuasion, or courtesy on the part of the Union committees. They have simply acted with the selfish impatience of very small-minded people who think their own importance in danger. They have dragged the men who trusted them to defeat and loss for no adequate motive. If their folly does not appear in its proper light to the workmen, it will be at least largely because those whose interest it is to make them see the truth do not do so, and because the lesson taught by the South Metropolitan Gas Company has been wasted on those who ought to profit by it. As for the conduct of the Unions to the community, it needs no qualification. No monopolist has ever threatened with such violence or displayed such insolent selfishness as they have.

THE ROBBERY IN HATTON GARDEN.

CONSIDERING how very easy it is to dislocate the common machinery of civilization, we may well be surprised that on the whole it should run so smoothly. The robbery in Hatton Garden was nothing more wonderful or more difficult than an attack upon one postman by several thieves, who took from him his letter-bag, and departed leaving him more frightened than hurt. Rogues are quite as careless as honest men, and these enterprising gentry had omitted to inform themselves when the Cape Mail would be delivered. Hatton Garden is of course the centre of the diamond trade, and if the robbers had secured the packages from South Africa, they would have come in for a good haul. As it was, they have not done altogether badly, a necklace priced at five thousand pounds being among their supposed pickings. The confusion into which the business of Hatton Garden has been thrown by this untoward event may be imagined if one reflects that none of the wholesale jewellers and silversmiths there residing know what are the particular orders and remittances which have thus miscarried. Tuesday morning's delivery failed. But of what did Tuesday morning's delivery consist? Frequenters of criminal courts have often been struck by the apparent stupidity of prisoners, and some may have been inclined to suspect that the stupidity was more apparent than real. But crime is really so simple a thing that the obtuseness may be genuine after all. Success in making an honest livelihood requires some good quality of mind or body, be it only a verbal memory or a muscular arm. To embark upon a career of crime a man need only be devoid of scruple. Exceptional ability or acuteness would be wasted. Take, for instance, this latest raid upon the post. To begin with, it was, as we have already said, made at the wrong time. Then, if it was not exactly advertised beforehand, there was no attempt to conceal the contemplated method of procedure. About five weeks ago a man named CROSBY, calling himself, and possibly being, a jeweller, rented a front office on the second floor of No. 10 Hatton Garden. The windows of this office were made of frosted glass, so that what was inside could not be seen. Mr. CROSBY came there when the mails were delivered in the morning, but was not often seen during the remainder of the day. Needless to add that since the robbery he has not been seen at all. It was at the door of this man's so-called office, which turns out to have contained nothing except a table and chairs, that SMALLEY, the postman, was assaulted, and into the office he was thrust without his mail-bag. It never occurred to the detective genius of the metropolis that there was anything at all suspicious in a jeweller without a business establishing himself behind glazed windows at a spot where parcels worth thousands of pounds were constantly brought by a single postman. It is superfluous for criminals to show caution when the police display such a childlike innocence.

We shall have for the next few weeks plenty of suggestions for avoiding similar occurrences in the future, and then the public will forget all about it till next time. Inspector LEACH, whose chief duty is to catch the thieves, volunteers the brilliant suggestion that postmen should go about in couples. This would be very expensive to the Post Office, and might entail upon the enemy the necessity of slightly increasing his resources. Its other advantages are not obvious to the naked eye. Mr. HENRY EDMUNDS, however, who writes to the Times from the scene of the robbery, contributes a useful and practical hint, which deserves the attention of Mr. RAIKES. "I would suggest," says Mr. EDMUNDS, "that instead of the package being "carried through the streets, and taken to the addressee, "the postmen should merely deliver a sealed notice to him, "and then he could proceed to the nearest post-office, and "receive his property after producing satisfactory proofs "of identity." The first objection to this scheme is that it would, as the lawyers say, "open a wide door to fraud." But then it may be answered that entrusting a postman with property worth thousands of pounds opens a window to robbery, even assuming that postmen are never dishonest themselves. In this case there is no reason whatever for suspecting the postman, but every reason to the contrary. Yet at most Assizes, and at almost every Sessions of the Central Criminal Court, postmen are convicted of larceny; nor has the almost uniform sentence of five years' penal servitude imposed by the judges availed to stop the offence. Mr. ANTHONY HACKBUT, whom every reader of Rhoda Fleming will remember, had withstood temptation for very many years before he finally yielded to the impulse of astonishing the world by robbing the bank. "The addressee "of valuable property," continues Mr. EDMUNDS, "would, "of course, take proper precautions to insure the safety of "it when in his own hands." That is perhaps a sanguine view. But the difference between diamonds in the pocket of a private individual and diamonds in a postman's bag is broad and plain. One man is known, the other is not known, to have valuables about him. It pays to watch a postman, and catch him as he is delivering his letters or packages. It would not pay to watch every one who came out of a post-office, on the chance that something more substantial than a clandestine love-letter would reward the quest. Certain post-offices might, however, require a special guard of police. It is not very long since the post-office at Hatton Garden itself was robbed, and a number of precious stones seized. Post-offices are now, if we may be pardoned the expression, so frequently manned by women, that they cannot be considered perfectly safe receptacles for jewelry to any amount. Nevertheless the proposal of Mr. EDMUNDS is not to be lightly dismissed.

THE ST. PAUL'S REREDOS CASE.

THE judgment of the Court of Appeal in the St. Paul's Reredos case, though not necessarily final, is extremely satisfactory, both in the particular effect, as far as it goes, and in the general principle which it confirms, taking the Courts of Appeal and Queen's Bench together, by a majority of four strong judges to two, who, with no disrespect to them, can hardly be called so strong. It is almost needless to say that the merits of the original application to the Bishop are no more in direct question than the merits of the reredos, though both seem to have been by some persons in judicial as well as many in extra-judicial positions imported rather far within it. A few people may think the original proceedings a respectable protest against superstition; to others they may seem one of the worst examples of the worst nuisance and scandal which has for some years weighed upon English law—the nuisance and scandal of persons who openly advocate and practise disobedience to the law by defect, endeavouring to persecute and punish what they choose to consider disobedience by excess. So, also, the reredos may seem to some as ugly as it seemed to Lord COLERIDGE (who devoted an episode of his judgment in the Court below to pointing out how much better the thing could have been done by persons who should be nameless), and others may think that nothing has ever so much improved the grandiose, but once terribly bare and unfurnished, cathedral of London. But all this was quite foreign to the matter actually at issue. The law says that the bishop shall exercise his discretion as to permitting such suits to go on, that they shall go on "unless, after a consideration of the whole circumstances of the case," he thinks it better that they should not. The application for a mandamus was based on the contention that he had not complied with the statute. Mr. Baron POLLOCK held that he had; the LORD CHIEF JUSTICE and Mr. Justice MANISTY that he had not. But these two learned judges in giving their reasons betrayed, in a way not common on the English Bench, the effect of ignoratio elenchi. Mr. Justice MANISTY thought that the Bishop had misinterpreted the Exeter reredos case. But, as the MASTER of the ROLLS pointed out, the statute says nothing—without stultifying itself it could say nothing—about the Bishop's consideration commending itself to other people. If he is only to consider subject to such approval, he has no discretion at all, as Mr. Baron POLLOCK had already contended. Lord COLERIDGE's judgment was still more remarkable; for it amounted practically to a confession that he did not like the law, that he thought a Bishop ought not to have discretion. That Lord COLERIDGE, as Lord COLERIDGE, is entitled to his opinions no one will question; but as Lord Chief Justice he has to administer the law, and not to make or unmake it.

It must surely be clear that any other decision of the Court of Appeal would have introduced—that any future decision of a superior Court still would introduce—a most dangerous latitude of interpretation. There can be no question whatever that the intention of the proviso in the Act was precisely this—to enable the Bishop, if he thought proper after due consideration, to stop litigation. If it is open to anybody to say that the consideration was not due because the result arrived at does not coincide with his own opinions, the proviso becomes a mere bad joke. And, further, if it is open to a judge to say in effect, “The law ‘has given this person discretion; I do not think it proper ‘for such persons to have discretion,’ what is the use of having laws at all? Let us go back to justice à la Caliph-and-Cadi. It is evident that the affirmation of Lord COLERIDGE's, if not of Mr. Justice MANISTY's, opinion would have a far wider reach than to reredoses. And this consideration should, as we have said, cause the judgment to be received with particular satisfaction, independently of any which may be entertained outside the merits of the particular question by those who admire the reredos as a work of art, or those who would in any circumstances welcome the defeat of a gang of intolerant and Philistine sectaries.

THE ADVENTURES OF EIGHT HOURS.

THE truth was never told more inappropriately by one man of another than when Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL described Mr. GLADSTONE as an “old man in a hurry.” It was not a reverent account of the Sage of Hawarden, but it fitted him with complete exactitude. Only, that Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL should launch such a saying!—he who at that very hour was conspicuous for all the follies of a young man in a hurry! There had been a time when it seemed that he knew how to wait, but it presently appeared that he had genius enough to put off the restraints of patience at a time of life when ordinary young men begin to put them on. After his first success—success well gained but very ill employed—he gave way to a fury of acquisition. Rush he must to seize at once upon everything within the sweep of a telescopic ambition, swivel-mounted. Confident in the strength of a swayer of the masses, he would be nothing less than Dictator from the first official perch he had lighted on. Cabinets were to be ordered, Ministers to be made and unmade by his voice. From one department of State he hastened to control every other, and would have all at command or dash the whole machine to fragments with a view to constructing a new one from patterns of his own.

Who is to say how much he might have changed, to his own glory, if he had really been a prudent man! But though prudence and patience are indispensable to the service of political ambition, they do not always follow it; and they have never yet been seen in company with Lord RANDOLPH's aspirations. We know what happened when he rushed to make his grand coup. It was but the dashing of a hasty head against a wall; and ever since Lord RANDOLPH recovered from the staggering effect of that wanton failure he has been plunging here and there—now in one direction, now in another—in search of some avenue of return to his lost distinction. Of course he should have waited. He should have gone, not to the ant, with whose lessons he had been previously acquainted, but to another exemplar of more particular value under the circumstances: we allude to Brer Rabbit, who always knew when to “lay low.” In all likelihood, the patient pursuit of a steady invariable line of conduct would have brought Lord RANDOLPH to place again before very long, and meanwhile he might have absorbed from exterior habits of principle some inward convictions that would have been of the utmost service to him. It did seem, indeed, for a time that he had been sobered into a perception that this was his right course of action. After his resignation escapade he did not rush off to form a new party or to join any of the older factions, but appeared at the right time in the Conservative ranks with a sober, dignified, and penitential air, which it would have been most wise to keep up. But though his attitude was marked with pleasure, and even with hope, it did not lead to his immediate restoration to office. Therefore he broke out again. And then he went back. And then he made another rush in an exactly opposite direction; and this has been done over and over again with startling suddenness, till almost every rag of his old reputation has fallen from him in the haste and velocity of the traffic.

It is not very long since Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL took a turn for the better. Only a few months ago he was praised in all the Conservative churches for a speech or two (he had been in retirement abroad just before, and retirement implies meditation) which were not only sound and good in themselves, but bore evidence that sobriety had come to stay in that strangely erratic and impatient mind at last. But now it appears that our hopes are again overthrown. Something has disturbed Lord RANDOLPH to his foundations once more. What it is is not exactly known. This time it can hardly be disappointment at not receiving an immediate public embrace from the PRIME MINISTER—that could not have been expected; and it really seems that, if the disturbing something has nought to do with recent occurrences at Birmingham, we must put it down to “ungovernable impulse,” as before. A few days ago Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL wrote a letter which was to have made a tremendous sensation. The shock anticipated was so great that his friends were carefully prepared for it, it seems; and in due course the letter was published. “Appeared” is the customary word for publication nowadays; but, strange to say, it is hardly applicable on this occasion. The newspapers printed the letter in an obscure place, where it hardly appeared at all; and from that day (which was Monday) to this, little reference to it has been made in any quarter. What significance there may be in that fact we are in no haste to determine; but, making all allowance for attention jaded by repeated extravagances, it is remarkable that an out-and-out Socialist manifesto from the hands of Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL should flutter to the ground unregarded and almost unperceived. For that is what this letter amounts to. Its author has been meditating again. Musing over an essay by the scientific Socialist Mr. SIDNEY WEBB, but not over that alone, Lord RANDOLPH has come to the conclusion that the Legislature properly can and probably should appoint the number of hours that every man shall work. Bringing refinement to bear on a coarse familiar saw, and prudently excising one of its clauses, Lord RANDOLPH says:—“Eight hours’ labour, eight hours’ sleep, and eight hours for mental and bodily recreation seems to me an ideal which a democratic Legislature, in its care for the welfare of the whole people, ‘may wisely and profitably endeavour to aim at.’ Endeavour means passing an Act of Parliament, of course; and this Lord RANDOLPH is now prepared to take part in. He has thought the matter out, and does not hesitate to say that an Act limiting the hours of labour to eight would be beneficial. It would diminish the number of unemployed men; and if it also resulted in ‘some, though not necessarily a large, diminution of the capitalist’s profits,’ that consequence is not to be hastily regarded as a disadvantage. It might be, or it might not; while as for the dangers of foreign competition, they are ‘illusory,’ Lord RANDOLPH thinks. Why? Because of ‘the certainty that labour ‘movements in this country will be closely followed and ‘imitated both in Europe and America.’ The certainty! How easy are the problems of industrial economy to the cocksure! Well, then, that is settled. Lord RANDOLPH has plunged again, and this time as we see. He roundly declares for the Eight Hours demand, the one point which many New Radicals shun; which Mr. MORLEY will have none of, though all the wild horses at Mr. LABOUCHERE’s disposal advance to dismember him; which even ‘the old man in a hurry’—hurried more than ever though he be—declines to catch on to as yet; which thousands and thousands of workmen themselves turn their backs upon with a knowledgable contempt. And if Lord RANDOLPH can advocate this part of the Socialist-Radical programme, what is there in it that he cannot warm to?—a question which he obviously must have meant to raise. It is very strange—as a matter of calculation and tactics. Is there any explanation of it? There is deliberation about this move, but the springs of it are most obscure. Can the decision of the Birmingham dispute have anything to do with it? Lord HARTINGTON and Lord SALISBURY are to settle whether a third seat for Birmingham is to go to the Liberal-Unionists or the Conservatives. With this seat Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL has been much and even passionately concerned. The decision of the arbitrators is soon to be announced, we are told. Possibly the Eight Hours manifesto may have been issued with a view to that matter; but to what intent is not clear. It will be sad indeed if we have to fall back once more upon "un-governable impulse"; and, in any case, there can be no doubt that there was much more of "impulse" than judgment or principle at work when Lord RANDOLPH wrote that unfortunate neglected letter.

ARMENIA.

ALTHOUGH it is probable that we are as yet very imperfectly informed of what has been actually happening in Armenia, it would seem also probable that the persistent efforts of the agitators and the unwise conduct of the Porte have worked together to produce actual disturbances which will become serious or not accordingly as it suits the interests, or the supposed interests, of Russia. The earlier story of a determination to help themselves against the Kurds, conceived by some Armenians and suppressed, or attempted to be suppressed, by the Turks, is too much what a newspaper correspondent, who knew what was wanted of him, would be likely to send, to be trustworthy without confirmation, and the other reports are vague in the extreme. On the other hand, the (also not too clearly or certainly reported) result of the trial of MOUSSA Bey is almost a little too probable. It is too exactly what the blundering and tormented wits of the Turk would be likely to hit upon. A desire to do substantial justice if it is not very troublesome and does not interfere with his prejudices on the one hand, and a desire not to discourage friends or comply too much with the meddling desires of the infidel on the other, are sure to have been present in the mind of the SULTAN; but whether they took the exact form which they were reported to have taken is uncertain. What is certain, however, is that no efforts have been left unused by those who wish to stir up a revolt, however slight, in some of the Armenian districts, and to keep it smouldering. The advantages of this proceeding are, indeed, too obvious to escape far less astute and experienced machinators. As an excuse for interference, as a provocation to some real "atrocities" on the part of the much-tried Turk, as a reason for asking the cession of more territory, or as a handle to squeeze concessions elsewhere, such disturbances are equally useful.

Some well-intentioned persons of, for the moment, tolerably correct views in the more pressing questions of home politics have deprecated the exposure of the sufficiently obvious intrigue which has availed itself of the unquestioned unwisdom and want of vigour in the Turkish government of Armenia. The deprecation would be of more force if it did not come from those who were gulled by Mr. GLADSTONE thirteen years ago, though they were wiser three years ago, and who apparently still believe in the "atrocities" (sham as regards the purpose for which they were used, if not invariably sham as to their actual occurrence) which led to the further aggrandizement of Russia, the further dislocation of the political situation in Eastern Europe, the Afghan and Central Asian calamities, and a whole peck of troubles other than these which we have not done with yet. It seems impossible to get into the head of amiable people of this kind the very simple proposition that questions of foreign policy cannot be decided on something like the principle of a benevolent instructor of children who allows gardens to TOMMY and HARRY, and, if TOMMY does not cultivate his well, takes it away and gives it to HARRY. It is a very undesirable thing that anybody's garden should be ill cultivated, that anybody's subjects should be misgoverned. Such misgovernment may sometimes be properly and profitably made the subject of remonstrance, or even in extreme cases of active interference. But before such interference is resorted to it must be clear that the whole body politic, the political world generally, will be distinctly benefited by the expulsion of TOMMY from his holding, and the installation of HARRY in it. Now, there are some people who, though they are very sorry that the Armenians or any one else should be governed as they do not like, are, in the first place, not convinced that the misgovernment is so bad as is made out, and, in the second place, are quite convinced that any further advance of Russia in Asia Minor would be an evil as compared with which the misgovernment of an indefinite number of Armenians would have to be regretted but endured. Which thing is, indeed, but a fresh exemplification of an old difference—the difference between those who muddle and those who keep apart the sciences of ethics and politics.

COIN AND STATISTICS.

MR. GIFFEN'S demonstration that we are richer than we were is one of those things which, partly because it is agreeable to hear, and partly for other reasons which need not be specified, most men are prepared to take on trust. It is true that there are persons who, like the authorities of the market to whom Dr. PRIMROSE appealed, think there is not enough gold in the country, and others who are of opinion there is not enough silver. This generation has added the complaint that there is too much of one metal. To these grumblers, whose accuracy and intelligence may be measured by their belief that the coinage of silver is made excessive in the interest of bimetallism, Mr. GOSCHEN has made answer by the mouth of Mr. CLINTON E. DAWKINS, to the effect that there is at least more gold than there ever was before, and if more silver is being coined, it is because it is wanted. The complaint that too much silver is being coined has much the appearance of the result of a desire to complain of something. A little reflection should have shown any one, without the need of explanations from Mr. GOSCHEN, that at a time when wages are rising on all sides, more of the coin in which wages are almost universally paid was likely to be required. But the wise man will never get impatient with any folly which may be talked about coin or substitutes for coin, or means of distributing coin, because it has been proved this many hundred years that upon this subject illimitable nonsense is talked and believed in every successive generation.

Mr. GIFFEN'S calculation may be the more readily taken on trust because he frankly acknowledges that it is necessarily largely based on guesswork, and that an estimate of the national capital from the national income is, from the nature of things, as good as impossible. A guess at the money value of a thing which cannot be sold is the nearest approach to poetry of which statistics are capable. That the nation is growing richer is easy to believe. All nations not periodically ravaged by Tartars, drought, or the plague, always do get richer. They do not all or always become richer at the same rate, nor does their wealth bear the same relative proportions from century to century. The rule is that a nation at the end of every generation is better off by accumulation and production than it was at the end of the previous one. How much richer it is the statistician finds great difficulty in telling, and for a very simple reason. He is necessarily compelled to express wealth in terms of money. He can find no other means of doing so. But money is not wealth. It is only an instrument of exchange, which varies incessantly in its relations to those things which are wealth. When these relations have varied sharply in a single generation, as they have in that which Mr. GIFFEN has just been surveying, it becomes as good as impossible to establish a precise comparison between one set of years and another. The calculation breaks its shins against the fall of prices or the rise of them, as the case may be. To the orthodox economist a rise in prices is no proof of great prosperity. The vulgar, including a great many persons who write on political economy, are of another opinion, but that does not matter. Neither is a fall in prices any proof that wealth is not steadily increasing. But there has been a great fall in prices since the end of the leaps and bounds time in 1875. Low prices, becoming ever lower, have ruled. When a comparison is made between the ten years ending in '75 and the ten years ending in '85, how much is to be allowed for the fall in prices? Many men give many answers. Mr. GIFFEN, who is one of the most competent, gives his with diffidence. He thinks, on the whole, that the national wealth increased 17·4 per cent. in the second decade, as against 40 per cent. in the former. This seems to be a falling off in the rate of progression. A falling off was to be expected, since 1875–85 were lean years, and yet the result is not a bad one. The increase in wealth did more than keep pace with the increase in population, which was enough. The question what calculations of this sort lead too, outside of the Inland Revenue Department, is one which it would be useless to ask the statistician. He loves piling up figures, and it is a harmless mania. He will not alter his ways—indeed, why should he?—because of the indifference of persons who cannot be got to see much good in estimates which are forcibly expressed in terms of uncertain value. Mr. GIFFEN is for the rest very free from the common mania of statisticians. He does not think that columns of figures afford a sufficient support for political theories. On the contrary, he protested against the unintelligent use made of some of his previous calculations. To be sure, protests are of little use. Not all that Mr. GIFFEN can say will prevent a certain stamp of speculators from making a jingle with figures and calling it an argument. We do not know that this makes us love statistics any the better; but it is perhaps no reason why they should be loved the less. After all, it is in any man's power to use them properly; and the proper use of them is to supply illustration and a little sharpness of outline to the solid knowledge which is obtained by deduction from and reasoning upon facts.

AN ABUSE OF LEGAL PROCESS.

WE have all heard the celebrated retort of the advocate to the judge who accused him of wasting the public time:—"My Lord, I know no one to whom the public time is of more importance than it is to my clients." It was a fair and spirited rejoinder. The abridgment of a case merely because it is long, or because there are a great many other cases to follow it, amounts to a practical denial of justice. Last Tuesday's Times contains three columns of argument and judgment in the case of REICHEL v. MACKARNES and another. The report is readable enough, at least for those eccentric people who like law. Lord ESHER and Mr. Justice MATHEW are keen-witted men. Mr. REICHEL is no fool. The discussion between them has a freshness and crispness which is absent from too many works of contemporary fiction. But there are litigants in the world besides Mr. REICHEL, and Mr. REICHEL had, to put it mildly, been already heard. Mr. REICHEL's legal history, though only four years old, has been so rich and varied in detail, that a slight sketch of it will repay perusal. It is true that, through the turnings and twistings of the devious narrative one "unceasing purpose," or unfailing principle, will be found to run. Mr. REICHEL has never succeeded. No Court and no judge, despite the flattering pronouncements he has quoted in a letter to the Times, have ever been induced to give one single ruling in his favour. But Mr. REICHEL is not daunted by that. He is not, like Mr. FRANK HAWLEY in Middlemarch, afraid of "breaking his nose against some damned judge's decision." When he is beaten he appeals. When the last appeal has resulted unfavourably to him, he begins a fresh suit, which he conducts in person, and carries it to the bar of the Lords. It is pretty and plucky; but it costs time, which seems no object to Mr. REICHEL, and money, which is not his, because he sues in the form of a pauper. This is only Mr. REICHEL's fun. He has "executed a post-nuptial settlement," so that he can live in "apparent comfort, with a house and servants," a bit of a New River share, "votes for Parliament," and everything handsome about him, while making an affidavit that he is not worth twenty-five pounds in the world, besides his clothes and his boots. The Divisional Court, treating Mr. REICHEL with extreme tenderness, refused to set aside the order which sanctioned his plea of pauperism, apparently on the ground that Mrs. REICHEL's interests ought to be protected. As the Court has stayed his suit for other reasons, the point is not a very serious one in the present case. But something ought to be done in restraint of this artificial contrivance for the manufacture of legal paupers. The Married Women's Property Acts were not intended to be used in this way. If such an employment of them were to be allowed, a millionaire who had sufficient confidence in his wife might enter upon a legal campaign with the certainty of never, in any circumstances, having to pay one farthing of costs.

The Reverend OSWALD JOSEPH REICHEL, the subject of these lines, was charged in August 1885 with conduct unbecoming a clergyman. Instead of facing the necessary inquiry, he resigned his living. He now says he was innocent, and, for all we know, he may have been. But the late Bishop of Oxford, having accepted the resignation, refused to sanction its withdrawal, and another incumbent was duly presented. Thereupon Mr. REICHEL took a course which he had a right to take, and for which he cannot be blamed. He applied in the Chancery Division to restrain the Bishop from treating the resignation as valid, and he urged that it was only to take effect in October 1886, whereas he had cancelled it the previous July. This was a fair issue; but the judge decided it against Mr. REICHEL. The decision was afterwards confirmed by the Court of Appeal and by the House of Lords, expressly and solely because Mr. REICHEL had definitely resigned his living without any condition or qualification or postponement whatsoever. Mr. REICHEL had thus done all he could to get his view of the matter accepted, and had failed because, whatever his impressions might have been, the facts were fatal to him. Thereupon it was his duty to submit and to obey the law. But Mr. REICHEL refused to vacate his benefice, and his successor was forced to bring an action to obtain possession of the vicarage. This action Mr. REICHEL persisted in fighting, though he had not a leg to stand upon, and he took it through all the Courts up to the House of Lords. We cannot help regarding it as a public scandal that he should have been able to do so. There could be no answer to the claim put forward by the new vicar of Sparsholt, except that Mr. REICHEL had not resigned. But three Courts, including the House of Lords, had already held that Mr. REICHEL did resign. It is not for laymen to dogmatize, or even to speculate on the mysteries of estoppel. But when complaints are made of heavy costs and long arrears, it would be ridiculous, if it were not shocking, to think of the time and money wasted in trying the same case twice over, with every possible appeal in both instances. Mr. REICHEL, however, was not satisfied even then. He went before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, and argued that his resignation had been obtained by fraud. Repulsed there, he still went on with the action which has just been dismissed as frivolous and vexatious. He charged the late Bishop MACKARNES and a Berkshire rural dean with conspiracy, breach of contract, fraud, undue influence, and oppression. He sought to make the executors of a dead man answerable for a libel published by the deceased, which is a solecism in law. He accused Dr. MACKARNES, on the strength of hearsay gossip, with paying a woman for making false charges against him; his suit is a monstrosity in fact. Yet he was allowed to occupy the best part of a day, and to put the Bishop's executors to serious expense, because there is no summary method of saying to a man, "Your claims have been decided against you; nothing more shall be heard of them in the Courts of this country."

THE CRONIN CASE.

WE cannot, of course, pretend to be satisfied even with the verdict—let alone the sentence—in the CRONIN case. The acquittal of Mr. "Senior Guardian" BEGGS is a particularly regrettable incident, because it was Mr. BEGGS's participation in the transactions that preceded Dr. CRONIN's "taking off" which in reality stamped the crime with its "official" character. BURKE, O'SULLIVAN, and COUGHLIN were, after all, only the human hands who executed the sentence passed in Camp 20 upon the exposé of Mr. ALEXANDER SULLIVAN; the chief of the secret conclave which condemned him must be regarded as the responsible head; and it is only when justice falls upon this portion of the anatomy of an assassination Society that an effective blow can be said to have been struck at it. Still more disappointing is the sentence passed upon the three convicted men—a sentence at which respectable American opinion, we are glad to see, is almost as much scandalized as our own. It is, of course, impossible to guess the explanation of the award of life-imprisonment only for a murder which combines the worst circumstances of cruelty and treachery with the most dangerous menace to the community in whose midst such crimes can be coolly planned and carried out; but it is to be hoped that the hypothesis of the presence on the jury of some objector, or objectors, to capital punishment may be well founded. True, it would be a reflection on the vanity of human effort if the State Attorney should have made 1,100 citizens of Chicago—or, at least, his proportion, whatever it was, of that array of rejected jurors—"stand by," in order to get a humanitarian faddist into the box after all. Still, it would be infinitely better so than that the escape of the three prisoners from the capital sentence should have been due to intimidation. We had much rather it should prove that a majority of the jury had compromised with the prejudices of the remainder than that their consciences had trafficked with their fears.

It is, however, the uncertainty in most minds whether this last account of matters may not be the true one which has won a qualified approval, in this country, at any rate, for the verdict and sentence. Indeed, it may be said that with us the verdict has carried off the sentence; it has been such a relief to get the one that we have been in no mood to criticize the other. With the public in the United States the case is different, and we cannot be surprised that the partial failure of justice in which the trial has resulted is causing them a good deal of chagrin. They have been so much in the habit of boasting—with good cause, it is fair to admit—of the promptitude and completeness with which the great Republic can stamp out anarchy and lawlessness when she sees fit to do so, that they have been a little humiliated at finding themselves liable to some of the miscarriages in these matters which they had flattered themselves befell only the effete governments of the old world. What must make it the more galling to them is, that it is the popular element in their system of procedure which has in this case failed them. Nothing could have been more admirable than the way in which the case against Dr. CRONIN's murderers was got up and presented to the jury. It reflects the highest credit on the intelligence department of the police who were entrusted with the work of providing the materials of the State Attorney's brief. But this, after all, is a branch of the administration of justice which despotic governments have shown themselves not altogether unable to manage satisfactorily. The real matter of democratic pride was that the free citizens of the Republic might, no less than judicial servants of absolutist Executives, be trusted not to bear the sword in vain. Well now, it appears that, for some reason or other, they occasionally do bear the sword, if not altogether in vain, yet to less purpose than could be wished—striking with the flat of it, so to say, instead of with the edge—and their countrymen are somewhat disappointed and scandalized accordingly. It has not apparently given them much pain to think that doctors in good practice in American cities engage in conspiracies to blow up public buildings in London with dynamite, and that members of an American detective force assassinate doctors in good practice for exposing the fact that moneys subscribed for the blowing up of public buildings in London with dynamite are diverted to less worthy objects. To us in England all this seems rather a Gilberto-Sullivanian arrangement of things; but the only point in it which appears to strike the American mind as unnatural and objectionable is the fact that the murder of the doctor in good practice by the detective and his accomplices should have been committed on American soil. This act of misconduct they hoped that an American jury would condignly punish. It has punished his act, but not condignly; and now that the sentimental American sympathizers with Parnellism have learnt that even after weeks of careful jury-sifting they cannot get a panel which can be trusted to hang three Irish assassins of the worst class, why, perhaps, the sentimental American sympathizer with Parnellism will in future lend a little less ready ear to Parnellite bunkum about jury-packing and Gladstonian declamation against the enormity of trying certain classes of Irish offenders before magistrates.

HOW TO BE DETHRONED.

THE combined apology and manifesto of the Viscount DE OURO PRETO must, we should think, have reminded not a few readers of the criticism made on the ill-placed confidences of another and more illustrious exile. Nobody who hears it can any longer wonder that the Viscount and his master are at Lisbon, and that Marshal DEODORO DA FONSECA is at Rio de Janeiro. It is a treatise on the art how to be upset, and is entitled to some respect, for it is written by one who is a past master in the theory and the practice. The late Premier of the late Empire of Brazil gives us as pretty a description of an upsettable government as we have ever seen. He tells how the Administration, of which he was the chief, showed its intention to do the most risky things, and yet took no precautions to be able to do them. He records the extreme goodness of the EMPEROR as illustrated by his inability to punish dangerous people. Then he wonders why the risky things turned out ill, and is shocked that the dangerous persons turned the EMPEROR adrift. "If," cries the eloquent Viscount, "if the great principles of morality and justice are eternal, what are the faults and crimes of Dom PEDRO II.? who, during a reign of fifty years, never persecuted anybody, never bore in mind acts of ingratitude, never avenged an injury, who was ever ready to pardon, to forget, and to do good, who abolished ipso facto the penalty of death, who promoted by all the means in his power the interests, progress, and greatness of his fatherland, in whose service he sacrificed rest and health." It is only too probable that the Viscount is not intimately acquainted with the works of the late THOMAS CARLYLE. He may therefore not at once understand what is meant by a universal scoundrel-and-sluggard Paradise. That, however, is precisely what the Empire of Brazil seems to have aimed at being. It came, therefore, to its natural end. The sluggard did nothing to help it. The scoundrel, quite untouched by drivellings of the milk of human kindness, kicked it over. Having nothing to show for itself but correct sentiments of the most platitudinous order, it tumbled like a house of cards at the first touch. Because it erst was naught, it turned to naught.

There are touches in the Viscount's Manifesto which are worthy of the purest farce. Mr. GILBERT himself, when in the highest spirits, and applying the immortal formula of Box and Cox in his most severe manner, never imagined anything better than the Ministry which "had in preparation measures to maintain order in the army in case of necessity by the civil forces." We shall live in hope of seeing the hint to the comic playwright contained in this lovely sentence worked out for us on the congenial boards of the Savoy. Here was an Empire supported by an army which could not be trusted out of sight of the police, and there was no police ready to watch it. There was an EMPEROR who never annoyed any man, who, on the contrary, was ready to take all kinds of offenders to his paternal bosom. Full of the noblest sentiments, he damaged a large and important section of his subjects by taking away a valuable part of their property without compensation—the part, in fact, which made the rest worth having. One fine day the Government reflects that five or six thousand half-mutinous soldiers are unpleasant neighbours in a capital, and it decides to send them to distant and disagreeable frontier stations. Then the semi-mutineers become mutineers out-and-out. They begin by pronouncing against a Ministry, and end by pronouncing against the Empire. The Premier in whose days these things happened is greatly surprised, but he ought to have his surprise to himself. The history of the Empire of Brazil illustrates, in fact, the nature of Revolutionary Monarchy very neatly. It began in rebellion headed by a son against his father. It therefore started by breaking with all respect for any right but the right of the strongest. As long as the ruler was an energetic man too dangerous to be attacked, or as long as nobody with a fighting force at his back cared to attack it, it rubbed along. At the first serious strain down it went. A monarchy which is not merely accepted as good enough for the occasion, but as an institution based on a divine right, and part of the national life, which has grown with the nation, gets on very well with a personally feeble sovereign. Such a monarchy as the Brazilian lasts just as long as the man on the throne is capable of beating any assailant in fair fight, or intrigue either, for that matter. Now, Dom PEDRO, although personally amiable, not without a decent sense of the becoming, and adorned by humanitarian sentiments and miscellaneous scientific tastes, was obviously not the man to hold the Devil fast. If it was not that he ruled over a people with as little devil in them as any in the world, he would have gone long ago. As it is, a common barrack-room conspirator has sent him packing. The Viscount DE OURO PRETO has gloomy thoughts of the future of Brazil. This iniquitous revolution, careless of noble sentiments and the Viscount, is not, he feels, and cannot come to, good. We confess we do not expect much from it; but, after all, a population which has no stomach for fighting, which rubbed along with an Empire for which it did not care two straws, which has submitted meekly to be disposed of by six thousand half-drilled half-breeds, commanded by a vapouring nonentity, may possibly continue to rub along in a state of squalid peace and prosperity under some hotch-potch called a Republic.

THE STRANGE FREAK OF A LIVERPOOL JURY.

THE jury before whom LAURENCE BELLEW and THOMAS FITZGERALD were tried the day before yesterday at Liverpool cannot possibly have been aware of what they were doing when they found those two "exclusive dealers" guilty of an offence against the English law of conspiracy. To return such a verdict at all in any part of England would have been bad enough; but at Liverpool, of all places in England—almost within hail, as it were, of the great authority on exclusive dealing, whose dicta they have so audaciously defied—and on Thursday last, of all days in the world, the very day when Mr. PARNELL was about to explain to their fellow-citizens how really innocent and even laudable a practice "exclusive dealing" may be! Surely there could not have been a more unhappy choice of place and time for declaring the monstrously perverse opinion that a combination to indulge in this harmless practice—a combination which Mr. GLADSTONE, out of the plenitude alike of his legal knowledge and his straightforward morality, has again and again declared to be lawful in England—is an offence against 38 & 39 Vict. c. 86, section 9. Yet it is of just this infelicitous selection of opportunity that the Liverpool jury have been guilty. BELLEW and FITZGERALD were simply exercising their right of lawful (Gladstonian) combination for the purpose of preventing intending purchasers of cattle in the Salford Market from purchasing the stock brought over for sale by two men named FRIZZELL, from the Massareene estate. To effect their object, these two vindicators of the right in question haunted the market by day, and attempted to dissuade dealers from having anything to do with the FRIZZELLS and their beasts, while at night they employed themselves in threatening the landlady of the inn, at which the two men and WALSH, the constable protecting them, lodged, with the extension of the boycott to her and her establishment by all the other Irish graziers unless she turned out her unpopular lodgers. It is impossible to conceive a case which comes more completely within Mr. GLADSTONE's definition of the "exclusive dealing" on which he looks with such sympathetic tenderness. No violence was employed or even threatened by BELLEW and FITZGERALD. They simply applied whatever "moral pressure they could bring to bear upon anybody" who could contribute to their project of inducing the "cattle-dealers of Salford to make their dealings exclusive" of the cattle of the two boycotted farmers. Yet, in spite of Mr. GLADSTONE's assurances that this is all right and proper, and the exercise of a privilege of combination, which "we should not for a moment think of interfering with in England," we have here a Liverpool jury who, after deliberating for the appallingly brief space of three minutes, find both defendants guilty of conspiracy; and we have here also a judge who described their act as "a barefaced effort to ruin a man who was endeavouring to carry on his business"; and, after adding that "they must learn that they could not break the law with impunity" (as if any man could break the law by doing what Mr. GLADSTONE says is legal), proceeded to sentence them to three months' imprisonment with hard labour.

On the evening of the day on which this singular verdict was delivered Mr. PARNELL was the guest of the Reform Club in this same city; and in the course of his after-dinner speech he discoursed impressively upon (among other things) the practice of boycotting in Ireland. With much eloquence and acumen, he pointed out how the only charge which has ever been alleged against the right of combination in Ireland on the part of the tenants is that combination leads to agrarian outrage and crime, how "boycotting had not led to agrarian outrage and crime," and how, nevertheless, Mr. BALFOUR, unlike the good Lord SPENCER, who only attacked boycotting when it led to crime, persisted in the persecution of boycotters who were boycotters only, and therefore (the argument requires) the persons who had committed no legal offence at all. Which interesting passage may or may not show that Mr. PARNELL had been already informed of the vagary of the Liverpool jury. But at any rate he knows it now, and we may suggest that he should go back and spend another night at Hawarden to obtain an opportunity of discussing it with Mr. GLADSTONE.

MR. PARNELL AT NOTTINGHAM.

THERE is something truly ludicrous in the forced ecstasies of the Gladstonians over the "moderate" and "businesslike" tone of Mr. PARNELL's speeches at Nottingham. It may be true, perhaps, that eulogies of this kind are good enough to be tried upon the class of intelligence which is represented by the worthy Mr. Alderman GRIPPER and his friends; but, after all, the entire English Separatist party does not consist of Aldermen GRIPPERS, and cannot be expected universally to share the naïf and open-mouthed wonder with which Mr. PARNELL's Nottingham convives seem to have been credited with regarding the phenomenon in question. Some, therefore, of these less foolish persons must have been tempted, one would think, to inquire with a little impatience what on earth they were assumed to have expected. Was it generally supposed that the guest of the evening would deliver another "Cincinnati speech," or that, like the dying Mr. DORRIT at Mrs. MERDLE's dinner-party, he would fancy himself back again in prison under Mr. GLADSTONE's custody, and flutter the assembled company by inquiring whether "BOB," or rather BILL, "was on the lock"? Even the most childlike innocence might have been prepared to find Mr. PARNELL with his "statesman's stop" on, and to hear him discourse admirably of the blessings which Ireland would enjoy under Home Rule, and the mild wisdom with which she would use her "recovered freedom." As a matter of fact, he made precisely the sort of speech which the commonest of commonsense would have expected him to make, and, with the exception of a rather risky excursus into recent history—in the course of which he found himself compelled to omit the little matter of the No Rent Manifesto from his account of the Gladstonian legislation of 1881 and its immediate consequences—he confined himself strictly to the safe ground of platitudinous generalities.

To these generalities we do not propose to devote any considerable proportion of our space to-day. We admit at once that the programme which Mr. PARNELL sketches out for the Irish Parliament of the future is everything which such a programme should be. There was never any doubt of his ability, or, for that matter, of the ability of any of his young men to draw it up. The only doubtful point in this matter is, and always has been, whether there is the slightest probability of its being fulfilled. We entirely agree with Mr. PARNELL that, when the Irish people have been given "power over their own business at home, they should not use it to plot against the integrity of this great Empire, and to levy war against the QUEEN," and that they should use it to "take advantage of those industrial and mineral resources which Ireland to some extent possesses, to look after the internal drainage of the country, to improve its harbours, to develop its lines of inland navigation, to promote the prosperity of its languishing fisheries," and so forth, and so forth. Nor are we acquainted with more than three reasons why an Irish Legislature should not in fact devote itself heart and soul to such useful works. These reasons are—want of will, want of ability, and want of money. The preference or otherwise of the Irish Legislature for schemes of arterial drainage to plots against the integrity of the Empire would depend partly upon the character of the persons of whom that Legislature was composed, and partly upon the popular sentiment acting upon them from without; and, even assuming that the development of Irish prosperity and that alone is the one dream of Dr. TANNER, Mr. O'BRIEN, and their colleagues of the Irish Parliamentary party, we have yet to learn whether it is equally near to the hearts of Mr. PATRICK FORD, Mr. ALEXANDER SULLIVAN, and the other Irish-American gentlemen who would, if Home Rule were granted, immediately make Ireland their happy hunting-ground, vice the United States of America superseded. As to money, and the ability to employ it judiciously, the total absence of the former of these requisites, and the extreme doubtfulness of the presence of the latter, are points too plain to be insisted on. The idea, indeed, that Irish Nationalists, after having steadily driven capital away from their country for years past, and now proposing to put the finishing stroke to the process by exporting what is left of the fee-simple value of the land in the pockets of expropriated Irish landlords, should thereupon undertake the enterprise of raising Ireland to a condition of prosperity "with our own money and our own resources"—this is in itself an idea which only a thoroughly "businesslike" assembly of Englishmen, such as that gathered round Alderman GRIPPER at Nottingham, could have received with sympathetic interest. The plain hard truth is, that there is no money to be got in Ireland for these or any national purposes except either from the English Exchequer, which Mr. PARNELL declines to draw upon, or out of the pockets of the people of Ulster, upon whom he assures us that an Irish Legislature would "shower blessings." As to administrative ability—including therewith the qualities of thrift, integrity, commercial prudence, official purity, and the like—the world's whole experience of the extent to which an Assembly of needy and pushing Irishmen would be likely to show themselves equipped with these qualifications is of the most discouraging nature. Four years ago Mr. Alderman GRIPPER would, we presume, have seen all this quite as plainly as we do, and would have abounded in reasons why the fortunes of Ireland should not be committed to such hands as these. And if we were in the Alderman's confidence, we should ask him to explain how it is that the characteristics of the Irish people have changed with the change in Mr. GLADSTONE's opinions.

It is not this which forms the really interesting part of Mr. PARNELL's speech. It is his references to the political rather than to the social, the industrial, the financial future of Ireland which really concern the English reader, and these only as affording indications of Gladstonian purpose, which are never to be had from what might be supposed to be the only authorized source. From these references it is to be gathered that the Bill of 1886—and, indeed, we may say the Bill, the whole Bill, and nothing but the Bill—still constitutes Mr. PARNELL's ideal settlement of the Home Rule question. The Legislature which that statesmanlike measure would have given to Ireland still strikes him, apparently, as the best of all possible Legislatures. He wouldn't have "GRATTAN's Parliament" now if it were to be offered him, though it was "what we used to ask for, because 'we had historical precedent for it.'" There was "danger 'of friction and mischief contained in GRATTAN's Parliament" which is not involved in the measure of 1886, and not for worlds would Mr. PARNELL expose the relations of the two countries to the danger of friction and mischief. He objects to the system under which "supplies for the army and navy" were voted separately by the Irish Parliament, and there "was an Irish Mutiny Act, which was also passed, distinct 'from the English Mutiny Act.'" He does not think that the Irish Parliament should have the power of refusing a contribution from Ireland "for the purposes either of defence 'or of foreign wars'"—such a power, we suppose, being obviously unsafe to entrust to an Assembly whose loyalty to the British Crown would be absolutely beyond suspicion, and which would be linked to the British people by a "union of 'hearts.'" All this is, of course, most edifying to those interested in the study of Irish Nationalist aspirations; but to those who wish to understand the English Parliamentary situation it is less satisfactory. No doubt it is very reassuring to hear that Mr. PARNELL does not want GRATTAN's Parliament, and that he will be quite content with the Bill of 1886. But then, unfortunately, the Bill of 1886 is dead. Its parents and guardians have so assured us a hundred times. It is dead, and has been succeeded by—what, we know not, but had cherished a faint hope that Mr. PARNELL might be able to tell us.

We do not even now say that he cannot; indeed, it is not at all unreasonable to believe that he is a far better authority on what the Home Rule Bill of the future will be—will have to be—than Mr. GLADSTONE himself. But it is quite evident that, if he can tell us, he will not. His assumed indifference to everything that has passed since 1886, to the hecklings of Mr. GLADSTONE by his own followers, to the heartsearchings of Professor FREEMAN on one side and of Mr. ASQUITH on the other, is positively sublime. To listen to him and to his calm discussion of a dead-and-buried project, one might have supposed that the echoes of Gladstonian domestic strife had never reached him, and that he had never so much as heard that Home Rule has begun to present itself to the slowly-awakened English followers of the great Home Ruler under the disagreeable alternatives of "Restoration of the Heptarchy," or practically complete severance of Ireland from the United Kingdom. But, of course, Mr. PARNELL knows all this as well as anybody. He is perfectly well aware that the old Parliamentary hand has been forced, and that Mr. GLADSTONE has been reduced to the same desperate expedient in his Irish policy as in his domestic programme—that, namely, of promising anything to anybody who threatens to give trouble if his demand is refused. And the fact that Mr. PARNELL must be so well aware of all this imparts all the more significance to his contemptuous silence. "After all," it seems to say, "it matters not a jot to me what shifts my 'revered friend may resort to for the purpose of keeping his 'very 'scratch' team of weak-kneed Liberals and Socialistic

"Radicals together. It is with me and my eighty-six 'Stal-' 'warts' that he will have to reckon at last; and either we 'get the kind of Home Rule that we want or he shall not get 'what he wants—his re-establishment in power." That, we have no doubt, is the way in which Mr. PARNELL looks at the situation; and, if that is his view, there is certainly no reason why he should take the slightest notice of the disputes in the Gladstonian party as to what their venerated leader either is or should be driving at. There is not even any reason why Mr. PARNELL should break silence on the subject before the general election. He may allow the Parnellite vote in the constituencies to be given to the Gladstonians without exacting from them any express and formal engagements as to their Irish policy; for that can always be arranged to his liking afterwards by means of the Parnellite vote in the House of Commons.

NOTES FROM THE ZOO.—THE EUROPEAN BISON.

IT is not often that visitors to the Zoo have the chance of seeing examples of so many species of wild and domesticated cattle as are to be found in the Gardens at the present time, and certainly never before have specimens of the two largest and fiercest of the wild cattle been in the collection simultaneously. Such, however, is now the case, as, in addition to the Gaur presented to the Society a short time ago, which we may add appears to be thriving immensely, they have lately been fortunate enough to receive "on deposit" a bull European Bison, or Aurochs (Bison bonasus)—an addition to the menagerie of no little interest; for, though this bison is not "new to the collection," it is many years since a specimen has been seen in Regent's Park; in fact, we believe we are correct in saying that the last, a cow, was obtained about twenty years since, and lived but a few weeks.

The bisons, both European and American, are unfortunately fast verging towards extinction, and though but a few years ago such a thing would have appeared impossible, there is now little doubt that the former will survive the longest, as, though its range is confined to the Caucasus and to the forest of Bialowicza, in Lithuania, it is most strictly protected by the Emperor of Russia, while its unfortunate American cousin has been practically exterminated, having fallen a victim to the greed of the pelt-hunters. The Aurochs, now as we have said extremely restricted in its range, was originally an inhabitant of all the large forests of central Europe, and is in all probability, though the fact has been disputed by many, and notably by Cuvier, the Urus mentioned by Cæsar, who described these animals as being little inferior in size to the elephant, but bulls in nature, colour, and figure, and further mentioned their great strength, speed, and fierceness. While in reality not quite so large as an elephant, or indeed as a rhinoceros, to which animal Cuvier compared it, the modern bison may fairly be described as enormous, far exceeding in size the American species, which otherwise it much resembles. Yet it, in turn, is said to be much smaller than its ancestors of quite recent times; indeed, the race is declared to be diminishing in height and weight as it decreases in numbers, though, apparently, it still retains its strength and fierceness, as it is alleged that an old bull is a match for four wolves. At the present time a large bull will stand about six feet to the top of the hump on the shoulders, and is about eleven feet long; whereas a height of seven feet and a length of thirteen feet have been recorded. The two species of bison are wonderfully alike in general appearance; they both have huge, ungainly heads, humps between the shoulders, and long shaggy manes on their heads and necks, with long beards under their chins; the hind parts are smaller than the fore, and have a comparatively weak appearance, though this is more noticeable in the American than in the European form. Again, in both cases the females are smaller and less shaggy than the male. The Aurochs, however, is by far the larger and finer animal, and, as indeed might be expected, has better horns. The two species, again, differ completely in their temperament; for, while the European bison is famous for its ferocity, the American is sluggish and timid—though this description hardly applies to the American bison bull at the Zoo, which is as bad-tempered and fierce a beast as can be found in the collection—and, in addition, has the credit of being one of the most stupid animals on earth. In fact, there is little doubt that this stupidity has been one of the causes of its destruction; for, as Captain Dodge said of it, "if not alarmed at sight or smell of a foe, he will stand stupidly gazing at his companions in their death throes, until the whole herd is shot down," and, "having made up his mind to go a certain way, it is almost impossible to swerve him from his purpose." And—the last difference between the species that we propose to mention—the Aurochs has but fourteen pairs of ribs, while the American bison has fifteen pairs.

The general colour of the European bison is a light brown; but the hair of the mane, beard, and legs, together with a stripe on the middle of the back, is much darker, almost inclining to black, while the long tuft of hair on the end of the tail is black. The hair, especially on the back and hind parts, is soft and woolly. The tongue is very blue in colour. The animal has a strong musky smell, which is very noticeable, but far from unpleasant; this is said to be strongest in the winter, and to be lost by degrees when the animal is in confinement; and, finally, the hide is said to be double the thickness of that of a domestic bull. The Aurochs at the Zoo is a fine adult bull, and is certainly a magnificent animal, standing, as near as we can judge, about seventeen hands at the shoulder. It is to be seen in the easternmost of the "Cattle sheds," next to the shed in which the American bison are kept (in which latter, by the way, a bison calf was born a few days since, a beautiful little animal, well worth a visit). As yet it prefers to remain in its shed, not having fully recovered from the fatigues and dangers of its journey; indeed, though it has been in its present quarters since Nov. 25, the poor beast is still most woefully stiff and strained, the result of being sent for a sea voyage of many days' duration in a large case or crate, the bottom of which was perfectly smooth, instead of being furnished with cross-pieces fastened to the floor to give its inmate a foothold. However, though so stiff that it can neither lie down, nor, when down, get up again with any comfort, it seems to be feeding well, and we hope, therefore, that it may live and thrive, and also that it may become the property of the Society.

SOME ILLUSTRATED BOOKS.

A VERY pretty book is The Quiet Life, with drawings by E. A. Abbey and Alfred Parsons (London: Sampson Low & Co.), though some there may be who would like less slippery paper, a less close approach to "niggling" in some of the illustrations, and different methods of rendering these, so as to give the clear and vigorous style of the old engraving, rather than the blurred and characterless smoothness of the modern process. Mr. Austin Dobson, who prologues and epilogues the selection with charming verses of his own, is the last man not to have felt the difficulty of his task; for here are Marvell's "Garden," and Cowley's "Wish," and Praed's "Quince," and "The Vicar," and Pope's "Solitude," and Randolph's delightful "To Master Anthony Stafford." A worshipful company to usher, a right difficult one to consort with and not seem misplaced. Yet does Mr. Dobson show nobly even with them, though, as all who know his style will expect, he has not "put himself forward." The illustrations are of course very numerous, and some of them are very pretty, a certain want of directness—as, for instance, in the frontispiece—being their chief fault. The difference between a book illustration and a picture generally—that the latter need not in the least, while the former must, tell a story—is too much forgotten by our illustrators, and the young woman in the frontispiece referred to is nearly as characterless as if she had been drawn by Mr. Small. Indeed, the landscapes and the head and tail-pieces please us in general better than the figures. Some of the latter, however—as, for instance, the village belles listening to Quince—are excellent. "The Vicar" is rather less happily caught. But Mr. Abbey's somewhat rococo antique is most at home with the piece from Randolph, which, indeed, could hardly fail to inspire him. Only the "process-server" here deserves as hearty execration as ever was bestowed by Irishmen with an objection to pay tithes. Vide more especially p. 86.

Another beautiful book by the same illustrators, but published by Macmillan & Co., is Old Songs, this time unillustrated by any modern writer. Seventeen there are of them, and a sweet seventeen they make. "I loved a lass, a fair one," opens the ball, and is well followed, the best of the following being, in different keys, the "Leather Bottel," "Here's to the Maiden of Bashful Fifteen" (but nowadays the Criminal Law Amendment Act has made this—Heaven save the mark!—"improper"), "Barbara Allen," "Sally in our Alley," "Kitty of Coleraine," and "Phyllida [the editors spell it, with strict fidelity to the original we own, "Phyllada"] flouts me." What we have said, both as to the design and as to the execution, of the other volume applies also here. The best, to the first piece, is Mr. Abbey's excellent plate of the midnight walk, though we do not like the face of either lover. All those which accompany "With Jockey to the Fair" are good, and "Sweet Nelly" is very sweet, though a little Madge Wildfirish in array. Good, too, are those of the "Leather Bottel"; but the toasting party who set at all from fifteen to fifty are spoilt by reproduction. "Barbara Allen" herself we like as well as any young woman of Mr. Abbey's we have ever seen. "Sally" is not so nice, and we do not want "Kitty" at all. But "Phyllada" makes amends for anything.

That Mr. Joseph Pennell's Pen-Drawing and Pen-Draughtsmen (London: Macmillan) is one of the handsomest books of the kind ever produced is a mere statement of fact, though the (let us say, in order not to risk the curse attendant on looking gift-horses in the mouth) disguised blessing of process haunts us even here. In part, however, the execution of those plates which are on unsized paper (for the quality of this medium has much more to do with the matter than seems to be sometimes thought) redeems the processes. And if Mr. Pennell had done nothing else but protest against the extraordinary misuse of the term "etched" for pen-drawn, which occurs in the most unlikely places, he would have won much forgiveness; though we doubt ourselves whether anything but real etching can do justice in reproduction to real pen-drawing. Some American weaknesses (such as the absurd statement that "technique is as great to-day as in any former time." Will Mr. Pennell be so very good as to point our blind eyes to the Rembrandts by dozens, the Lionardos in shoals, who encumber our exhibitions?) have also to be forgiven, and, indeed, the letterpress of the book concerns us little. No doubt when Mr. Pennell pushes bad taste and absurdity so far as to say that "it is affectation for an artist to-day to model his style on Dürer," certain sharp sayings leap to the tongue or pen; but they may be repressed. Let us concern ourselves, not with Mr. Pennell's criticism, which is generally execrable, but with his examples, which are, despite their defects of medium, almost always delightful. The "Comparative Heads," with which he opens, from Dürer, Vandyck, Rossetti, Madrazo, and others, are well worth study. The Fortuny opposite p. 36 is infinitely profitable in the same way, and so in a somewhat different way is the first hors texte subject from Daniel Vierge. The full villainy of process could not be better illustrated than in the Montalti on p. 47, though the Fabrès following makes some amends. Far above either of these is the architectural study, softened by the paper it is printed on, from Martin Rico. On another plate close by, the head from A. Casanova y Estorach, one might write a small volume. It is extremely clever, but it is emphatically quack work; the slashes and cross-hatchings giving the impression that the artist thought by these means to produce in black and white something like a portrait of the Brescian school in colour. Very different is the head from Menzel, which occurs a little later. But nothing that we meet after it for some time pleases us half so well as a "Cup and Cover," by A. Stucki, though as a book illustration the girl by Waldemar Frederick, opposite p. 86, is good. M. Lhermitte needs little praise to those who know his work; and M. Detaille is too well known to make either praise or blame necessary. The same may be said of "Mars," of M. L. Leloir, and others; but Mr. Pennell is probably alone in having heard M. A. Lançon, excellent draughtsman of beasts though he be, called the "Cat-Raphael." Of our own countrymen, Mr. Sandys, Mr. Madox Brown, and the President lead off; but the pen-drawing quality of the work of neither is so noteworthy as is that of Mr. T. B. Wirgman. Several of our friend Mr. Punch's men follow, and Mr. Walter Crane, and Caldecott, and then a multitude of juniors, after whom we pass to America; and a very large, and naturally large, share of attention America has. Altogether the book is delightful to turn over; less delightful, except to the satirist, to read.

A new edition of Mr. Jessop's very popular Jackdaw of Rheims is accompanied by a companion Ingoldsby volume, Netley Abbey (London: Eyre & Spottiswoode), which, no doubt, will be as popular as its forerunner.

Messrs. Sampson Low & Co. send us a handsome volume, Twenty-five Drawings of some Places of Note in England, by Birket Foster, with short descriptions by the artist. "The twenty-five places" include Bamborough (a graceful and effective drawing, but a little delusive as representing the original); Bolton Abbey (very well sketched, but, like Bamborough, somewhat "thrown up"); a view of King's Parade, Cambridge, in which the gingerbread screen obscures the mighty chapel; a much better one of Canterbury from St. Martin's Hill; a very good plate of the Chester "Rows," taken from within; a rather prettified Eton; Hampton Court (brought nearer the river than it actually is—this seems a besetting sin of Mr. Foster's); Knaresborough, Lambeth ("translated" a little); the High at Oxford, conventionally but well grouped at the usual, and almost the only possible, point between Queen's and University; the Tower (again conventionalized a little); Winchester, from a point which does not permit of giving the great characteristic of the cathedral—its enormous length; Windsor (very good of its kind), and a few others. All are interesting locally; all are elegant pictures; and, if art has sometimes done an unnecessary utmost with them, that is not a very bad fault.

Mr. M. B. Huish has edited (London: Virtue & Co.) a new issue of Turner's Seine and Loire, about which it is difficult, if not impossible, to say anything new critically, but which the editor has managed to introduce and annotate very successfully. We have only one fault to find with the volume, that by some maladroitness the tissue-paper guards stick to the plates and refuse to come away without tearing. Of the plates themselves, as we have said, there is little new to say. They are not exactly faithful; they set an example of idealizing localities which in hands not of genius has been only too much followed; but the charm of them is quite unique. To see such a plate as the well-known "Amboise" is never to forget it. Perhaps it is not Amboise, but it is something better.

On Active Service, by Mr. W. W. Lloyd, late of the 24th regiment (London: Chapman & Hall), is a rather slight, but thoroughly unpretentious, and not by any means unamusing, record of military scenes in chromolithography. The difficulties of stowing away under regulation weight the furniture of a too luxurious barrack-room; the morning coffee on board ship; signalling interrupted by turbaned black persons with tulwars; the atrocious conduct of certain British gunners who, under a misapprehension, practised (luckily very wide) with seven-pound shells at a harmless group of Kaffir maidens; the painful effect of a night alarm on a perhaps not equally harmless bottle of "square-face"; more than one death in the desert; a heroic cook not merely defending the sacred marmite, but resting his rifle on it; the drawbacks of sleeping bags when the enemy comes up suddenly, and the very literal manner in which a camelman may find himself "up a tree," are only a few of a collection of cheerful and by no means ill-drawn pieces.

Flowers of Paradise (London: Macmillan & Co.) is what, we suppose, most people would call a pretty book, but it is one in which the aim is better than the execution. The "music, verse, design, and illustration" are all by Reginald Hallward. Of the music of Reginald Hallward we say nothing; but in the verse of Reginald Hallward the great genius of Reginald Hallward has, we fear, deserted him. Here is a specimen:—

Children ye have but to take it,
That fair robe of orient hue;
Stretch thy little hand toward it—
God has given all things to you.

This is a verse which might make Blake depict Mr. Hallward in the grasp of a particularly lurid worm somewhere in the infernal regions, while the milder genius of Watts veiled a but half-protesting brow. This same poem is illustrated with an angel of such surpassing hideousness and vulgarity, that we fear no one of the angelic fraternity will care to fly down and take Mr. Hallward out of the worm's grasp. The design and illustration generally suggest a hopelessly corrupt following of Japanese models, seen through a wavy mist of Mr. Crane, Miss Greenaway, and Miss Greenaway's French imitators. In fact, it is very long indeed since we had the honour of seeing anything, on the whole, worse.

A cheap reproduction of Randolph Caldecott's Sketches, edited by Henry Blackburn (London: Sampson Low & Co.), will be welcome, and deservedly welcome, to many. They are of all sorts and kinds, and they come from all sorts of places. "Young Lochinvar," "The Irish Landlord," and "Toy Country" are not more agreeable in one way than the "Morning Walk" (of storks), the Law-Court sketches, and "Somebody's Coming" are in another; or than that inspiration of an elder day, the "Ladies' Battle," with its sequel, in a third; or the "Passing Glimpse of a Gentleman whom I took to be the Chancellor of the Exchequer" in a fourth. In fact, these scrappy things are often much more amusing than the artist's better-known work when he became fashionable.

THE ROYAL SOCIETY OF PAINTERS IN WATER-COLOURS.

THE present Exhibition of Painters in Water-Colours is an interesting one, although many of its most celebrated members are absentees this winter. But Mr. Burne Jones, who has been lately recalled to the bosom of the Society, bravely supports it with his fourteen lovely drawings and studies; while of Mr. Albert Goodwin's numerous contributions, one at least, the "Eton" (48), will be welcomed by his many admirers. The three water-pieces of Mr. Henry Moore, though there is little to be said about them, are delightful. The ladies are well represented by Mrs. Allingham and Miss Clara Montalba, who between them exhibit no less than twenty drawings; Mrs. Allingham, deserting her usual bowery gardens for strips of English coast, while Miss Montalba remains faithful to her early love, Venice, whose fascinating façades she delights to portray under their ever-changing aspects of sunshine and shower.

By Mr. Burne Jones are two life-size drawings (217, 223) in pencil, of the head of a young girl, of which the one in profile is, perhaps, the more perfect of the two in its firm, graceful outlines and good modelling. Two drawings in long, narrow frames—"Allegorical Statues in the Wall of the Garden of Idleness" (218, 224), the subject taken from Chaucer's Romance of the Rose—represent the façade of a building along whose front are ten niches, in each of which stands a greyish bronze statue of an evil quality. Hate, Envy, Jealousy, and the rest of that unpleasant set are there, all huddled up and distorted by their wicked passions. An Early Italian gentleman, enveloped in a long greenish cloak, strolls by, and turns uneasily on his heel as he gazes from one to the other of these strange hosts. Between each niche is inserted a large slab of marble of a ruddy-fawn or green-grey tint, and near these linger several gentle spotted antelopes, from whose refined faces gaze out their innocent eyes; their spotted tan hides form a pleasant scheme of colour with the tones of the marbles. Along the top of the wall are nestled little white marble amorini. Of the studies in silver-point of figures and drapery, 216 and 219 are very beautiful. In the one a slim form bends on one knee, and holds one raised arm folded across her head, the drapery clinging closely to the figure in small folds; while in the other the position is a more recumbent one, and the drapery is treated more broadly and simply. In the "Design in Gold and Black" (215) the composition needs concentration; it looks flat; the attendant figures around the main figure appear too monotonously posed. Of "Two Studies of Figures for Picture" in one frame (227), the one of a sleeping girl reclining against a high-backed bench is full of graceful beauty, and is an example of fine draughtsmanship.

In contrast to the refinement of Mr. Burne Jones may be observed Mr. Walter Crane's "Two Sketches for a Picture—The Roll of Fate" (256), where the figures look somewhat heavy and voluptuous, while his "Beauty sat Bathing" (259) is neither striking nor interesting in any way. But of Mr. Crane's several effective drawings in white line upon a brown surface the best is "Sketch for a figure of Diana" (255), the goddess holding a couple of slim hounds in leash, forming a very pretty group, but one which is too obviously copied from Mr. Thornycroft's famous statue. Several spirited studies of animals by the late Mr. Frederick Tayler, of high-mettled horses, of shaggy Highland cattle—in their natural state, not groomed to sleekness, as so much of the modern Scotch scenery is—are excellent; while the drawings of dogs give most happily their various expressions and characters. Of Mr. Marks's several birds, his white "Sulphur-crested Cockatoo" (297) strikes us as being the best; he looks like a white-whiskered, Roman-nosed old general, of the pleasant garrulous description that we have all known; in fact, he is quite a bird of the old school!

By Mr. Glindoni are three figures drawn neatly and coloured gaily, "The War Chart" (22), a man in a red coat studying a map spread out on the top of a drum; "The Pedlar" (46), with a red nose, bearing before him his diversified wares, displayed on his open pack; and "Say I'm not at Home" (266), a gaily-dressed elderly bachelor, toasting his knees before a fire, with a table drawn up close to it, on which is spread an elegant repast; these are, all of them, cleverly handled. Mr. J. D. Watson's pretty "Robinson Crusoe" (196), clad in a sky-blue shirt, holding a red pipe, and chatting intimately—almost jocosely—to a green parrot, is a typical boyhood's hero. "The Poisoned Cup" (189) is more worthy of Mr. Watson's old reputation. The figure of the cup-bearer, clad in green and white—his face as white as his doublet—standing at an open cupboard, while he pours the poison from a phial into the crystal cup of ruby-coloured wine, makes an effective piece of colour, seen as it is against the full-toned gold wall at his back.

In landscapes, Mr. Pilsbury has some charming country scenes, of which "Somersetshire Cottages" (119) is a delightful specimen of an unspoilt English village; it shows a street with houses close against the road, and crowds of hardy flowers, chiefly nasturtiums, bursting through the irregular wooden palings of the tiny gardens. Mr. David Murray has several of his numerous tribe of sketches of hill-sides. In "Over the Moor, among the Heather" (173), the hill-tops and trees seen against the sky are neatly suggested; but some pleasanter way of obtaining a foreground could surely be secured than by scratches with the eraser, which has been here very freely and heavily applied.

Mr. North's "Cherry Trees in Autumn" (182) shows a clearing in an undulating wooded country, grey hills lying low beyond, with a straggling group of crimson-leaved wild cherry-trees in front, of that wonderful red that these trees assume after a sharp frost; a tiny kingfisher sits pensively on a twig near the ground in front, regarding with sidelong glance a small pool of water. Mr. North has been very successful in this drawing. Of Miss Clara Montalba's many drawings, "The Façade of San Giorgio" (197) does not seem to agree well with its inky-skied background; but her group of "Fishing Boats" (290)—some golden-sailed, and others with cream-white sails, yellow-tipped—resting almost motionless in mid-water, forms a charming patch of colour. Mr. Herbert M. Marshall also has a good study of beached boats, with their sails drying, in his "St. Ives" (167).

MR. WINDOM'S SILVER PLAN.

THE chief interest felt in the meeting of the United States Congress centred in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, and particularly in that part of it which was expected to deal with the Silver question. The Bland Act was passed for the express purpose of keeping up the price of silver, but it has utterly failed, and the price of the metal has gone on falling year after year. In the present Congress the Silver party is strong, and it has been known for some time that the leaders intended to introduce a measure for the amendment of the Bland Act. The more extreme are in favour of free coinage—that is, opening the Mints for the coinage of any quantity of the metal sent in by any person whatsoever. The more moderate would be satisfied to leave the coinage in the hands of the Government, provided the amount minted was increased. Knowing the intention of the Silver party, it was understood that Mr. Windom intended to recommend a measure of his own. Various reports as to the nature of this measure were afloat, but it turns out that the Secretary of the Treasury had kept his secret well, for his proposals differ from everything that had been foreshadowed. He explicitly condemns the several plans of the Silver party, and very clearly points out the mischief that would follow if any of them were adopted. In their place he propounds a scheme of his own. Briefly stated, it amounts to this—to repeal the Bland Act altogether, and stop once for all the coinage of silver; but, on the other hand, to open the Mints of the United States for the free deposit of silver bullion in unlimited quantity, and to foreigners and natives alike. He recommends that notes be issued on the security of these deposits equal in amount to the actual market value of the silver at the date of deposit, the notes to be redeemable in silver bullion at the market value of the day on which redemption takes place. But if the Government so chooses it is to have the option to redeem the notes in gold, or if the note-holder wishes he is to have the option to be repaid in silver dollars. Further, the notes are to be receivable for all taxes, and to count as part of the reserves of the National Banks. In other words, they are to be legal tender. The effect of the scheme, if it be approved, may be thus stated. Suppose an owner of silver were to deposit in the Mint 100 ozs.

of the metal, and at the time of deposit the market price were to be a dollar per oz., he would receive 100 dollars as payment for the deposit. If the price were to rise, so that 100 dollars would purchase in the market only 90 ozs. of silver, then, if the holder of the notes wished to withdraw the bullion, he would receive only 90 ozs. instead of the 100 which he had deposited; but the 90 ozs. would still be worth the 100 dollars. On the other hand, if the price of silver were to fall, so that 100 dollars would purchase 110 ozs. of bullion, the note-holder on presenting his notes for redemption would receive 110 ozs. It will be seen that under the scheme the United States Government would take the risk of loss or gain; in other words, it would become a great speculator in silver. Mr. Windom sees very clearly that the mine-owners of the world would have a strong temptation to combine for the purpose of raising the price, and to guard against this he asks for a discretion temporarily to suspend deposits when he has reason to believe that a combination is formed against him. It is always rash to predict what a legislative assembly will do, especially when it sits 3,000 miles away, and is elected by constituencies scattered over an area as large as all Europe. Still it is difficult to believe that power such as this will be given to the Secretary of the Treasury. Mr. Windom is a man of character, who has done nothing to warrant us in supposing that he would abuse the power if it were vested in him; but who can say as much respecting his successors? A corrupt man might, by suddenly suspending deposits, not merely alarm all silver holders and cause a fall in the metal, but might throw the money market of the United States into confusion, for the issue of silver notes would be suspended whenever deposits were stopped; thus he would cause a fall in all prices. And by as suddenly resuming deposits he might cause a rise. Even if the Secretary were himself uncorrupt, he might be deceived by less scrupulous persons, or he might be wanting in judgment and might do as much mischief as if he were personally dishonest. Still it is possible that the Silver party may accept the proposals, and may attempt to hedge round the discretion to be given to the Secretary by precautions that in their opinion would prevent it from being abused.

If they do, and if the measure is worked as they would wish, it clearly must raise the price of silver very considerably. It will be seen that the United States Treasury will issue notes on the deposits of silver according to the market price of the day. What the Treasury will give, therefore, will really be determined by the price in London. Assuming, therefore, that the Act is passed, it will be to the interest of the mine-owners to restrict the supplies of the metal in London, in the hope thereby of forcing up the price, and to deposit in the American mints the greater part of the world's output. Mr. Windom argues that the mine-owners of the United States and Mexico may do this, but that it is unlikely other producers will, because they would get no more in Washington than they would get in London, and they would be at the extra expense of sending the bullion across the Atlantic. But the Secretary of the Treasury fails to see that this small extra expense would be more than recouped if the price were raised in London, for then all fresh deposits would be paid for at an enhanced rate. As, however, there is a proviso in the scheme that, however speculation may drive up the price, the Mints are never to pay for the deposits more than one dollar for 412½ grains of standard silver, which is the amount now contained in the legal tender silver dollar, the price could never rise above the equivalent of one ounce of gold for sixteen ounces of silver. But assuming that other nations did not take advantage of the opportunity to sell their silver, and that the production was not greatly increased, the price might reach that height. The Secretary of the Treasury thinks that other nations would not sell their silver, since the only countries which hold very large amounts of it are those which form the Latin Union, and they require the silver as a guarantee for their notes. He holds, on the contrary, that the proposal if adopted would be likely to induce European nations to co-operate with the American Government in rehabilitating silver. Even if this be so, it seems evident that a considerable rise in the price of silver must very greatly stimulate production. We all know that the operations of the Copper Syndicate in Paris did last year very greatly increase the output of copper, and it is reasonable to expect that the same result would follow from action on the part of the United States Government, which is very like that of the Paris Copper Syndicate. The low price of silver has compelled the closing of many mines. A much higher price would enable these to be reopened, and would afford an inducement to the owners of the richer mines to increase their output. The probability, therefore, is that the first result of the measure, supposing it to be adopted, would be a sharp rise in silver; the second, a great increase in the production; and the third, unless a general international agreement was made, a fall in the price. It is obvious also that the measure would lead to very wild speculation. Mr. Windom endeavours to prevent this by reserving power to the American Government to redeem the silver notes in gold. When silver had temporarily fallen but was likely to advance speculators would have a motive for withdrawing the bullion from the Treasury in order to wait for the rise. In the same way, when a fall seemed probable they would have an inducement to deposit largely in order to wait for the fall, and then present their notes for redemption and receive an increased quantity of bullion. These manœuvres, he contends, could be prevented if the Secretary were judiciously to exercise his discretion to redeem the notes in gold. We have, however, little confidence in the efficacy of precautions such as these. When all the speculators of the world are banded together against a single department of a single Government, the chances are great that they will succeed. Even without going outside the United States, we shrewdly suspect that Mr. Jay Gould alone would prove too much for Mr. Windom and his subordinates. So clearly are all these objections recognized in this country, that the opinion of the City is that Congress will never accept the recommendations. And in consequence there has been a fall in the price of silver. We do not see the reasons for the fall, for the Secretary of the Treasury's scheme proves that he believes the Silver party to be strong enough to carry some measure for increasing the purchases of the metal by the American Government. But the market here is impressed by Mr. Windom's condemnation of the various plans put forward by the Silver party, and fears, therefore, that any Bill forced through Congress by that party, if different from Mr. Windom's recommendations, may be vetoed by the President.

There are other objections to the scheme which more immediately affect the United States. We have pointed out above that, if it were to be adopted, mine-owners would have a strong inducement to withhold supplies from the London market, and to deposit in the Mints of the United States by far the greater part of the annual output. Must not a time come, therefore, in which there will be a physical difficulty to provide storage for the immense accumulation of bullion? Mr. Windom frankly states that he and his predecessors have done their utmost to get silver dollars into circulation, that they have failed, and that, therefore, he is driven to the conclusion that it is mischievous to coin any more. The accumulation, therefore, cannot be materially lessened, and every year that passes it will become more and more troublesome to deal with. That is a small matter compared with another difficulty. However rapidly the United States may grow in wealth and population, a time must come when it will be impossible to increase the issue of silver notes. No doubt the redemption of debt will decrease the banknote circulation, and for a while, therefore, will make room for silver notes. When the banknotes are all withdrawn, the Government may, if it pleases, redeem the greenbacks, and thus make room for further issues of silver notes to the amount of 70 millions sterling. But when the greenbacks as well as the banknotes are all withdrawn, how is provision to be made for an indefinite increase of the note circulation? It seems clear, at some time or other, gold must be driven altogether out of the country. If the American people were deliberately to make up their minds that a silver standard is as good as gold, and were, therefore, to adopt the former, they might suffer no great harm; but they have not so made up their minds. On the contrary, they desire to hold a considerable quantity of gold as well as of silver; yet this scheme, if adopted, would lead necessarily to such an issue of silver notes as in the long run must drive gold out of the country. When that comes to be recognized, it is highly probable that the money market will be thrown into alarm, that people will begin to hoard gold, and that then it will rise to a premium. Nor is it to be forgotten that the United States Government has contracted with its creditors to pay the interest and the principal of its debt in gold. If the holders of United States bonds begin to fear that gold may be driven out of the country, and that consequently the Government may not be able to fulfil its contracts, the credit of the United States will seriously suffer. It may be replied that the debt will be all redeemed before the danger becomes serious. Even if that be the case, there remains the vast mass of industrial securities of all kinds which are payable in currency. While specie payments were suspended in the United States it will be recollected that railway and other industrial Companies issued bonds of very large amounts, payable in currency—that is to say, in paper. Since the resumption of specie payments the interest and principal have both been paid in gold, and consequently there is now in public opinion no difference between the gold bonds and the currency bonds. But, if Mr. Windom's scheme were to be adopted, it is clear that the currency bonds might be paid, principal and interest, in silver; and what would be the effect of that upon the market for American railroad securities? Ingenious, then, as the scheme undoubtedly is, and carefully as it evidently has been studied by the Secretary of the Treasury, it has not been thoroughly thought out. It is nearly, if not quite, as vicious as the plans of the Silver party, and it is difficult to believe, therefore, that it can ever pass through Congress.

THE LONDON IMPRESSIONISTS.

THE time is past for stigmatizing what calls itself the Impressionist School as one founded wholly on principles of the negation of art. The French group which formed itself around Manet, and which taught so much to Bastien-Lepage, Duez, Dagnan-Bouveret, and others who never belonged to it, has now enlarged and become a power in art-life. We may deplore the extent to which it has been welcomed, but the degree of its success cannot be doubted; and, now that the thing has crossed the Channel, and that we have a Society of London Impressionists of our own, it is our duty not to puff them away, but seriously to consider their claims. The first exhibition of the London Impressionists, who are ten in number, is now open in the Goupil Gallery, New Bond Street, and fills the same room which was so lately adorned by the works of their Parisian colleague, M. Monet.

Of these ten gentlemen, two are not, in the accepted sense, Impressionists at all. Mr. Francis E. Jones contributes twelve examples which are simply water-colour sketches of scenery, washed in very rapidly and, we are bound to add, often very skillfully. His sunny simple drawing called "Uddimore" (11), and his "Westfield" (14), bathed in the pensive air of summer evening, would take their place in any collection of landscape sketches; but why they should be called Impressionist we cannot conjecture. Mr. Frederick Brown's pictures come under the same category. They are vigorous sketches, and one of them, "Walberswick Church" (46), seen looming across the moor on a hazy afternoon, is a very fine piece of work, admirable in tone and well drawn. But it has absolutely nothing in common with the Manet or the Monet trick.

The rest certainly unite in trying to render out-of-door effects in the manner first introduced by the former of the French painters just mentioned. Manet was a painter wholly devoid of the colour-sense, possessing an eye singularly little tamed by accepted convention, and lacking perseverance in execution. He succeeded in painting a scene with striking effect up to a certain still elementary point, and could carry it no further. He determined at last to found a school whose principle should be to stop at that elementary point, and he found plenty of imitators. That Manet was superior to his school, and that he was progressing in knowledge and skill at the time of his lamented death, no one who saw his "Bar des Folies-Bergères" at the Salon of 1882 could doubt. The influence of this work is strong still; it is particularly strong on Mr. Walter Sickert, who makes music-halls his speciality. His "P.S. Wings in an O.P. Mirror" (69) is, no doubt, a clever transcript of something Mr. Sickert has seen; but it is blurred, incoherent, unintelligible. "Little Dot Hetherington at the Bedford" (65) is still more ambitious, with its blaze of light concentrated on the youthful performer. But it is the inherent fault of all these compositions that they are dull and abstruse versions of what is nothing if not perfectly clear and brilliant. Mr. Bernhard Sickert's six sticky oil-paintings are in the same manner, but much more amateurish.

A real gift has not been denied to Mr. Sidney Starr, though he has trained it strangely. "The City Atlas" (6), which shows the back of a large girl in a purple dress, with the sunset down Oxford Street beyond her, is clever, and would be positively pleasing if the colour were not so distressing. There is skill and a smart effect in "The Shop Girl" (4), and in "The Marble Arch" (1), in spite of the crude greens of the foliage in the latter. Mr. Starr's most pleasing work here is "Still Life" (9), a silver tea-service set out under trees. Mr. George Thomson paints in oils with a very clumsy touch, but he has evidently studied Monet to some purpose, and where no delicacy is required he sometimes produces a cumulative effect which is rather fine. No one who admits the possibility of such art as this being accepted at all should deny power and a certain gorgeousness, too, "In Kew Gardens" (22), where the contrast between the massed beds of scarlet geraniums and the pale paths and deep background of foliage is extremely bold and rather happy.

Mr. P. Wilson Steer is the most extravagant of all. His landscapes, especially 38 and 40, are simply and crudely horrid. But he has a certain happy knack of rendering the effect of an open sea-beach, and his radiantly amethystine "Tidal Pool" (39), if you stand far enough back from it, is almost beautiful. Mr. Paul F. Maitland deserves our thanks for, at least, eschewing the hideous lilacs and purples that most of his colleagues are enamoured of. He leans rather to Mr. Whistler's method than to that of Manet and Monet. His studies of London streets are pale and delicate, in tones of buff and pearl-grey; the best examples are "The Gardens, Chelsea Embankment" (47), and "Milman's Row, Chelsea" (51). Mr. Theodore Roussel also affects the Chelsea neighbourhood. He is more ambitious than Mr. Maitland and has less taste. His "Opalescent Evening, Chelsea" (55), is a huge expanse of unpleasant violet-blue, which has nothing "opalescent" about it, and suggests neither "evening" nor "Chelsea." It is curious that some of these grotesque painters have more skill in the figure than they are willing to show, as a beautiful silver point by Mr. Thomson, the "Pretty Rose Pettigrew" (35) by Mr. Steer, and the portrait (58) by Mr. Roussel accidentally prove. Mr. Francis Bate, finally, paints very rough landscapes in ugly colour; "Christchurch, Hants" (60), is the least offensive of them.

RECENT CONCERTS.

IN "St. John's Eve," a short Cantata produced at the last Crystal Palace Concert, Mr. Cowen has advisedly returned to the style of music for which he is best fitted. With the single exception of the Scandinavian Symphony, none of his more ambitious works have given any signs that his talent can produce music of lasting value in the highest realms of his art, whereas his smaller compositions show that as a writer of graceful trifles he has few equals. It is with these latter, rather than with his "Ruth" and "St. Ursula," that "St. John's Eve" must be classified; and if the work is not altogether a success, the reason is that its composer is not always satisfied with confining himself to the style in which he excels, but too often courts failure by attempting to do what is, with the means at his command, an impossibility. The libretto of "St. John's Eve" is from the prolific pen of Mr. Joseph Bennett, but it will not rank with his happiest efforts. The story it unfolds is of the simplest. Nancy, a "Village Maiden," is beloved by Robert, a "Young Villager," whose attentions she repulses on the advice of Margaret, an "Ancient Dame"; she gathers a rose on Midsummer Eve, in order to keep it until Christmas Day, when, according to tradition, it will remain fresh, and her future husband will come and claim it. After the rose is gathered a serenade is sung by an anonymous "Young Squire." Nothing further happens for six months, but on Christmas Day Nancy appears at the young Squire's house wearing the unfaded rose, which is snatched from her by Robert. She, however, refuses to marry him, and all ends happily by the young Squire informing the assembled villagers that the rose Nancy wears was substituted by him for the flower gathered on St. John's Eve. Why he should have waited so long before acknowledging his passion to Nancy, and why eventually he should have adopted so needlessly troublesome a stratagem, does not appear; these questions seem, indeed, to occur to the simple villagers, for with a sudden burst of candour they exclaim, "What all this means is hard to tell"; but it is scarcely fair to criticize seriously a plot of so very unpretentious a character, which, after all, answers its purpose sufficiently well in affording the composer a peg upon which to hang his pretty tunes. It is in the lighter portions of the work that Mr. Cowen is most successful. The best number is an orchestral interlude representing a dance round the bonfire on Midsummer's Eve. In this ingenious use has been made of two old English melodies; the delicate scoring and grace of the music make the hearer wish that the composer would confine himself to writing ballet music, for in this style of composition it would be hard to find his equal. Another good number is Margaret's scena, "You, Susan, when the midnight bell," in the first part; the concluding love duet is also in the composer's best manner, and, delivered as it was on Saturday by Miss MacIntyre and Mr. Edward Lloyd, produced considerable effect. The music for Robert, on the other hand, is some of the weakest in the work; for Mr. Cowen has not the necessary power of dramatic characterization which the part requires. Mr. Plunket Greene, who sang Robert's music, was obviously suffering from the effects of a severe cold, which rendered his ungrateful task still more difficult. The choral singing throughout showed distinct signs of improvement; the Crystal Palace Choir has not been heard to such advantage for a long time. "St. John's Eve," though it may not add to the composer's reputation, will probably prove an acceptable work among country choral societies, where light and pleasing melodies are more in request than works of depth and imagination. The remainder of Saturday's concert consisted of an excellent performance of Beethoven's Overture to Fidelio, and of a Ballad for Baritone Solo, Male Chorus, Orchestra, and Organ by Grieg, which was announced as a first performance in England, though the work was produced by Miss Holland's Choir some few years ago. Grieg has hitherto produced so few choral works that his setting of Björnsterne Björnson's Land-Kæmning would awaken interest quite apart from its merits as a composition. Fortunately these are considerable, and the whole work ranks well among the best which the Norwegian master has given to the world. The subject of the Ballad is one of the semi-mythical adventures which have gathered round the name of Olaf Trygvason, the greatest of the early kings of Norway. The musical setting is constructed upon very simple lines, but it is admirably adapted to the solemn dignity of the subject, and the national colouring of the themes is never obtrusively prominent, as is too often the case with Grieg's music. Land-Kæmning deserves to be often heard; within its limited extent it is an admirable work.

The programme of the last of Mr. Henschel's Symphony Concerts contained a novelty in the shape of a "Notturmo" by Mozart, which had not previously been heard in London. The work presents some interesting peculiarities owing to its being written for four small orchestras, each one consisting of two violins, viola, violoncello, and two horns. Three of these orchestras are used only for elaborate echo effects, in the following manner:—When the first orchestra comes to the end of a passage, at the last bar the second orchestra takes up either the whole passage, or the last four bars of it; at the end of which the third orchestra takes up the last three bars, and is succeeded by the fourth, which repeats the last two bars. This intricate construction is maintained throughout the Andante, Allegretto, and Menuetto, of which the work consists; in the trio of the last movement alone the echoes are silent. Although the "Notturmo" partakes somewhat of the nature of a puzzle, the music is singularly fresh and bright. Mozart's genius was so spontaneous that it could not be fettered by any trammels, however cunningly devised, and this work, the construction of which would have hampered most composers, is no exception to the rule; for the music can be listened to with pleasure, and without feeling that it is merely the result of a carefully considered scheme, as is so often the case with such compositions. The performance, unfortunately, might have been better, the horns in the fourth orchestra being weak and poor in tone and execution. The programme of the same concert included Beethoven's Fourth Symphony, the love scene from Berlioz's Romeo and Juliet, the Funeral March from Wagner's Götterdämmerung, and the Walkürenritt from the same master's Walküre. The last two selections were received with much enthusiasm by the largest audience which has yet attended these concerts this season. It would perhaps be well if Mr. Henschel were to reconsider the advisableness of beginning the performances at eight, instead of at half-past; under the present plan most of the audience in the stalls are kept waiting outside until the end of the first piece, and the increased attendance in the cheaper seats does not seem so large as to compensate for the inconvenience the early hour of beginning gives to the patrons of the dearer places.

At last Monday's Popular Concert the chief feature was a very fine performance of Brahms's Sextet in G major, Op. 36, by Mme. Neruda, Messrs. Ries, Straus, Gibson, Howell, and Piatti. The work, though not taking as the earlier Sextet in B flat (Op. 18, No. 1), is a very fine example of the composer's chamber music, and, like almost everything that proceeds from his pen, gains upon every successive hearing. At the same concert Miss Fanny Davies played in her best style five of Schumann's Kreisleriana, which were received with such applause that she was obliged to play another number of the same series. Miss Davies was also associated with Signor Piatti in Veracini's Allemande, Largo, and Allegro, for pianoforte and violoncello; and with Mme. Neruda in Beethoven's Sonata in G major, Op. 30, No. 3, for violin and pianoforte. Miss Liza Lehmann was the vocalist, and revived a charmingly quaint song of Dr. Arne's, "Polly Willis," written in his later and more florid manner; besides singing M. Francis Thomé's graceful "Perles d'Or." Miss Lehmann's performances are always so enjoyable that it seems unnecessary to praise them, but upon this occasion she seemed to excel herself. Her singing of Arne's song, especially, was a model of admirable vocalization and charm of manner. The programme-book of this concert seemed to want a little revision. In the analysis of Schumann's Kreisleriana, Sir George Grove figured as "Mr." Grove, E. T. A. Hoffmann as Hoffman, and the article on Schumann in the Dictionary was attributed to the editor, instead of its author, Professor Spitta. Perhaps it would have been too much to expect that the author of the analysis would have pointed out the fact that the name "Kreisleriana" is that given by Hoffmann to part of the Pantasiestücke, and does not (as Professor Spitta states) originate in a "fantastic poem" by that strange genius.

Messrs. Heinrich and Schönberger's last Evening Concert, which took place on Tuesday, was devoted entirely to the works of Brahms. The pianist played the Sonata in C, Op. 1, two Capriccios from Op. 76—the second of which was encored—and the Ungarische Tänze; while Herr Heinrich sang one of the composer's latest published works, the five songs numbered Op. 105, and seven Romances from Tieck's Magelone. None of the performances call for detailed notice. Herr Schönberger's playing was throughout the concert, both in his solos and the accompaniments to the songs, altogether excellent. Herr Heinrich's style was displayed to most advantage in "Verrath," the last song of Op. 105; in the quieter and more purely lyrical numbers he was less satisfactory.

THE WESTMINSTER PLAY.

FREQUENTERS of the Westminster Play must needs rejoice when once in four years the Andria comes round. For the play is not merely—with all respect to those who prefer the Adelphi—the best acting play in the cycle, but it follows the Trinummus, which is beyond all question the dullest of the four. The plot is of the slightest. Simo wishes his son Pamphilus to marry the daughter of his prosperous friend Chremes. Pamphilus wishes to escape the marriage, for the good old reason that he loves another, and the five acts of the play are occupied in the efforts of the young man, or rather of the slave—who has all the trouble and the odd hits—to break off the match without hurting Simo's parental feelings. That is really all; for the secondary plot dealing with the love of Charinus for Philumena, the girl whom Simo wishes Pamphilus to marry, is roughly sketched in, and apparently is only introduced for the purpose of making things more unpleasant for Pamphilus when Davus's first ingenious scheme breaks down. In fact, the play is a pure comedy of intrigue, with no serious interest whatever, unless the love of the hero for the heroine, whom the spectators never see, and only hear at one interesting moment, is to be called serious. But for a modern audience, most of whom follow the dialogue "wi' deeficulty," if at all, that Latin play is best which contains the greatest number of amusing scenes and the smallest number of dull ones, and from this point of view the Andria is certainly the best of the Westminster cycle. After the first act, which is excellent reading, but rather weary watching, the action goes merrily along to the end. The last act has often been adversely criticized, but it is really necessary; for, although the diverting scene with the baby in the fourth act has informed Chremes of the existence of that inconvenient young person, and so made it certain that he will not give his daughter to Pamphilus, we are still in doubt how Simo is to be reconciled to his son's union with Glycerium. If the objector goes on to say that the identification of Glycerium with the long-lost daughter of Chremes is a stale and unworthy device, it need only be replied that those who cannot breathe the atmosphere of Latin comedy as if it were familiar air had better let it alone, and delight their souls with the more artful stratagems of the modern farce-writer.

Of course all Latin comedies, and the Andria even more than most, depend for their success mainly upon the performance of the leading slave. At Westminster the traditions of acting are so good and so carefully preserved that the part is never ill played; and whenever an actor is found of real dramatic ability, which cannot, in the nature of things, happen every year, the force of natural aptitude and sound tradition combined produces an admirable piece of acting. We can recall to mind two Westminster players, in the course of the last ten years, who have possessed real capacity for acting—Mr. Bain, who played Davus and Geta in '80 and '81, and whom we have much pleasure in congratulating on his recent academical success, and Mr. Buchanan, whose admirable performance as Mysis made the Andria of four years ago memorable, though unluckily he was never seen in such a part as Davus. To these names we may fairly add that of Mr. J. S. Phillimore, who plays Davus this year. He is undoubtedly the best slave who has appeared since Mr. Bain, and though he is not so good an actor all round, there are moments when in voice, look, and gesture he is the crafty, impudent rascal to the life. He was very good in the scene with Mysis, where the baby is put on Simo's doorstep, and perhaps still better in his scenes with Simo. His exclamation, "Vah, consilium callidum!" when Simo explains his device of the pretended marriage, was a triumph of mock-earnestness, with just the right touch of ironical exaggeration. He was rather less good in the last act, when Davus is released from punishment to hear from Pamphilus that all is happily arranged. Davus here should not be occupied solely with his aches and pains. He should start forward to congratulate his master, and be reminded of his strained muscles by that sudden movement, then forget them again, to be brought up short by another twinge. Mr. Phillimore was too consistently doleful; but this was the only flaw in an excellent performance. Mr. C. A. Phillimore, too, was good as Simo, a part which does not offer very many chances to the actor. He was best in the scene where Crito, the Stranger from Andros, comes in to prove that Glycerium is the daughter of Chremes. His indignation at the supposed imposture, and his elaborately assumed air of indifference as the strength of the evidence becomes apparent, were very well done. After these two brothers, who bore the chief burden of the play, Mr. Balfour, as Mysis, deserves mention. He supported Davus excellently in the most effective scene, and his shrill utterance—apparently the dying effort of a treble voice—suited the character well. Of the two young men, Charinus was the better played. Mr. Gillett, who took the part, has a really fine voice, and his rather tragic manner was well suited to the doleful character of the love-lorn Charinus. Mr. Henderson, who played Lesbia, the midwife, deserves the highest commendation for his admirable make-up.

The epilogue is above rather than below the average. It is certainly not so well written as last year's, which was nearly, if not quite, the best that we can remember; but it is well constructed, and the ingenious author has contrived to introduce allusions to most of the important and amusing events of the past twelve months. If we might venture a general criticism, we would suggest that the writers of these epilogues might do well to sacrifice a few allusions for the sake of greater unity of purpose. The best-constructed Westminster epilogue that we can remember had for its subject the trial of an election petition. There were plenty of general allusions, but everything was made subordinate to the main plot, and the piece gained greatly by the restraint thus imposed. This year, clever as the epilogue is, it has no semblance of a plot, and suffers a little, in our opinion, from overcrowding. But much of it is very funny, and there is always a delightful sense of incongruity aroused by hearing the players, clad in modern dress, discuss modern topics in the quaint circumlocutions rendered necessary by the use of a dead language. The inscription "Opus volumus. Nobiscum unda fluit. Ad Campum" on the banner of the unemployed at once moves to laughter, and Dromo, as a black pugilist, if we may be permitted the use of the adjective, challenging Chremes in elegiacs, is delightful. The end of the epilogue is very happy. Crito comes on as a member of the licensing committee of the County Council to inspect the Westminster Play, apparently under the impression that he is in the Aquarium and not in Dean's Yard. Finding nothing to object to on moral grounds, he pounces upon the son of Pamphilus, who

Natus.

But his doubts are cleared away by the information that the play is witnessed by

Princeps et Judex et Episcopus atque Decanus, and when he has blessed the play altogether, the actors sing to the appropriate tune the following version of a familiar chorus:—

Nam bonus ille vir est lepidusque; ita dicimus omnes.
Hoc, nisi mentitur, nemo negare potest.

A merry ending to a very good performance.

MONEY MATTERS.

THE very low rates of interest and discount that have ruled so long have at length led to the result that was to have been expected—namely, a considerable drain of gold, during the week ended Wednesday night, as much as 793,000*l.* having been withdrawn from the Bank of England. The Bank stock in consequence has fallen to less than 19 millions—a very inadequate supply under the circumstances. The reserve fell during the week nearly three-quarters of a million, and is now less than 11½ millions. There has, nevertheless, been exceedingly little rise in the rates of interest and discount. The danger is therefore great that the drain will continue, and that alarm will be excited after Christmas, if not even before. Ever since September the Berlin money market has been stringent, and the Liquidation there at the end of each month has been found more and more difficult. The final Liquidation of the year has now begun. The rates charged to Stock Exchange borrowers are exceedingly heavy. Indeed, many speculators have been compelled to close their accounts from the difficulty they have found in obtaining the accommodation they required. Besides all this, the causes which usually make the money market stringent at the end of the year are operating in Berlin as well as elsewhere. There is, therefore, a strong demand for Berlin. The gold offering in the open market is being bought on German account, and bar gold would be taken from the Bank of England were it not that the Directors have put up their selling price. At any moment sovereigns may be taken, and in considerable amounts too. But the German demand is less serious than the Argentine. It is not improbable that Berlin may be provided with all it requires from St. Petersburg and Paris; but the Buenos Ayres demand threatens to become very great. The crisis in Buenos Ayres, which has been growing acuter every day, has now become really serious. Speculators complain that they cannot obtain money on any terms, and the banks evidently are afraid to lend. Failures are reported in large numbers, and the difficulties of Buenos Ayres have extended to Monte Video. Consequently, gold is now being taken in considerable amounts for Buenos Ayres, and there are rumours that the withdrawals will be large for some weeks to come. Unfortunately, the supply of loanable capital in the outside market in London is unusually large for this time of the year, because of the recent payment of nearly two millions by the Exchequer to the County Councils. The Directors of the Bank of England, who ought to have acted more promptly, have at last decided to take the requisite measures to lessen that supply, and obtain for themselves control of the market. By vigorous and sustained effort they may stop the drain; otherwise it is to be feared that a gold scare may arise before long, unless, indeed, the great houses that came to the relief of the market twice already this autumn again take measures to provide the gold needed for Germany and South America elsewhere than in London.

Disappointment with Mr. Windom's silver plan, which is explained pretty fully elsewhere, has caused the price of silver to remain under 44*d.* per oz. this week, holders thinking that the recommendations of the Secretary of the Treasury will not be accepted by Congress, and that the President will veto any Bill that may be carried through Congress by the Silver party. It is, of course, impossible to predict what the President will do, but it is reasonable to assume that, if very large majorities in both Houses support the Silver party's Bill, it will be allowed to pass by the President.

The stock markets have all been dull this week. Many brokers, indeed, have already begun to take their holidays, and jobbers, to relieve the ennui of utter idleness, amuse themselves with practical joking. The uncertainty of the money market and the near approach of the Christmas holidays and of the Settlement, which will begin on the day after Boxing-day, account to some extent for the stoppage of speculation, but there are other causes that contribute. First amongst these is the acute crisis in Buenos Ayres, which threatens to become a crash before very long. Then there are the difficulties of the Berlin Bourse Liquidation. German speculators have shown extraordinary skill in getting over their embarrassments, Liquidation after Liquidation, and they can count confidently on help from German bankers and from great financial houses in London and Paris. It is possible, therefore, that the present Liquidation will somehow or other be got over without a crisis. But still there is much anxiety on the subject. Then, again, rumours continue that we are on the eve of political disturbances in Spain, while the more that is learned about the Brazilian revolution the less it is liked. Furthermore, the New York money market is also very stringent, and though ease will probably return early in January, there is no inclination on either side of the Atlantic to engage in new risks during the present month. Lastly, the labour disputes all over the country have a disquieting influence. But while there is no inclination to buy, there is equally little to sell; and, consequently, prices remain very steady. Indeed, most people hope that ease will return to the money market in two or three weeks, and as, besides, immense sums will have to be paid in interest and dividends, not only in London, but in all the great capitals of Europe and America, there will be very large amounts for investment. Moreover, they think that the continued improvement in trade must revive active speculation. For this reason speculators for the fall are quietly buying back the stocks which they had sold without possessing. And the statement in several Paris papers that M. Spuller has intimated to our own Government his willingness to assent to the conversion of the Egyptian Preference Debt leads people to expect a general advance in foreign government bonds early in the New Year.

The Buenos Ayres papers state that at the October Bourse Liquidation in that city scarcely a member of the Bourse was able to pay his differences. Sixteen were declared defaulters, and the others escaped the penalty only by obtaining assistance from the banks. In Monte Video, to which the Argentine speculation has extended, matters were even worse. The whole Bourse appears there to have been literally bankrupt. The Committee of the Bourse, in consequence, postponed the Liquidation for a week twice in succession. And it is asserted by the newspapers of both Buenos Ayres and Monte Video that the Presidents of the Argentine Republic and of Uruguay used their influence with the banks to induce them to furnish the means by which the ruined speculators were enabled to settle their differences. Most of the operators, it will be understood, were Argentine citizens. The Liquidation in both cities was not completed till about the middle of November, and then the November Liquidation was about to begin. Apparently it has been got over by somewhat similar means, and now the time has arrived for another Liquidation. It remains to be seen whether it also will pass over without a crash. Political and financial influence will, no doubt, be used to the utmost to prevent the crisis from growing worse, and it may avail for a time; but it would seem to impartial observers that the longer the agony is prolonged the worse must be the final breakdown. To reassure the public an official document has been published in Buenos Ayres, showing that the assets of the Argentine Government amount to over 700 millions of dollars. A very large part of these assets consist of Government offices, furniture, arsenals, war-ships, and the like, which clearly are not realizable. They are required for purposes of administration, legislation, justice, and defence, and cannot in any sense be looked on as means of maintaining the credit of the Government. The railways, telegraphs, public lands, and the like, no doubt are assets in a truer sense of the word; but then it would take a long time to realize either the railways or the telegraphs, and a very much longer time to sell the lands.

A GLORIOUS PRIVILEGE.

[Fears are entertained lest the verdict of the jury in the Cronin case should expose them to popular violence.—Daily Paper.]

WOULD you like to be a juror 'neath the star-y-spangled banner,

And the shadow of the Eagle's wings that stretch from sea to sea,

And to try a case of murder, in a juratorial manner

(When the prisoners are Irish), in the country of the free?

If you would, you'd better advertise, through some convenient channel,

For a steadygoing gentleman inured to business cares,

Who will, while you kick your heels until the Court completes the panel, Undertake your correspondence and look after your affairs.

Then, impanelled, you'll address yourself the web to disentangle

Of mendacities that multiply as day succeeds to day,

While the alibis accumulate, and eager lawyers wrangle,

And like a dream the golden weeks steal tranquilly away.

You will have to get accustomed to the frequent friendly warning

Of the dangers of perversity, transmitted through the post,

Till the fate that may your throat await, explained on many a morning,

Merely adds a pleasing relish to your cup of tea and toast.

Then, the evidence concluded, when, with conscience all untroubled,

To perform your awful duty you will solemnly begin,

With your faithful guard of constables considerably doubled,

To discuss the case together they will snugly lock you in.

You'll discuss it with the man who thinks "a certain doubt's arisen,"

With the man who holds them innocent, the man who "doesn't know,"

With the man who's all for hanging them, the man who would imprison,

And the man who deems them guilty, but would like to let them go.

You'll be kept from Friday evening in confinement over Sunday,

And will only then convict the men, known guilty all the time,

By agreeing to award them such a punishment—on Monday—

As is quite an insufficient retribution for their crime.

And when then the people's fury, to be checked by no repentance,
Rages round you, you will wonder, as you face its seething flood,
Which inflames—your cruel verdict or your too indulgent sentence—
Any given individual who desires to have your blood.

You will know not whether lynching should be taken as a token
That the prisoners' conviction has displeased the Irish "bhoys,"
Or whether their escape from death has caused your head be broken
By the law-abiding people of the State of Illinois.

So I would not be a juror 'neath the star-y-spangled banner,
And the shadow of the Eagle's wings that stretch from sea to sea,
If I had to try for murder, in a juratorial manner

REVIEWS.

TWO BOOKS OF POEMS.*

THE adventitious but curious interest attaching to these volumes, first, from their almost simultaneous appearance; secondly, from the resemblance between them as the work of two contemporary poets, the first of their country, and, for some years past, of the world, both of whom had attained quite unusual fulness of years; thirdly, from the melancholy—if, indeed, it is to be called melancholy—coincidence of Mr. Browning's death with the appearance of Asolando—this interest is not to be neglected, but cannot be allowed the chief place in a literary estimate. The Muses called Mr. Browning, as they called Philemon, singing, but as he had finished his song; and England, happier than Athens, is in no fear of being deserted by them on the same occasion.

Both the volumes well maintain their authors' reputation, and one—the Laureate's—contains in its final verses what is very rare in a poet of advanced years—a new note. We quoted last week, as applicable to the author of Asolando, the two latter of these charming stanzas—the two former, which are almost more beautiful, may complete the citation now:—

Sunset and evening star,
And one clear call for me!
And may there be no moaning of the bar,
When I put out to sea,
But such a tide as moving seems asleep,
Too full for sound and foam,
When that which drew from out the boundless deep
Turns again home.

Wide as has been the range of the Laureate's lyre, we think that any good ear which can hear a church bell in stillness must perceive here a string added if he compares the piece with its nearest ancestor, the closing verses of the "Palace of Art." The cadence is not Tennysonian, nor in great part at least the phrase, though both (which some egregious critic has, we observe, called "homely") are in the highest degree worthy of their author. One does not expect in a poet, least of all in a poet of eighty, many surprises of this sort; nor does one find them; yet, short as this volume is, there is another. Lord Tennyson has always been fond of metrical experiments, and has generally been happy in them. But in "Forlorn" he has achieved, as the other Master in the other Isle used to say, a "frisson nouveau." The story—betrayal, contemplated deception, if not child murder, and so on—is no great thing. It begins with this stanza:—

He is fled—I wish him dead—
He that wrought my ruin—
O the flattery and the craft
Which were my undoing . . .
In the night, in the night,
When the storms are blowing.

"Ruin" and "undoing" is not a very good rhyme (and we may observe in passing that there are more loose rhymes in this volume than Lord Tennyson has accustomed us to); but let no one think that "blowing" is intended to chime in. On the contrary, the refrains of the succeeding stanzas are arranged thus:—

In the night, in the night,
While the gloom is growing.

In the night, in the night,
When the ghosts are fleeting.

In the night, O the night!
O the deathwatch beating!

and so on, making a strangely effective, if barbaric, cymbal-and-triangle clash. Outside of these two, most of the pieces fall within the wide, but well-known, range of the poet's previous work. Some of them are known already—"Vastness," the "Jubilee Ode," the "Throstle," and so forth; but we do not think that these are in any case the best. The dedication to Lord Dufferin contains a pathetic threnos on the late Mr. Lionel Tennyson, and opens with a majestic stanza of the poet's best stamp:—

At times our Britain cannot rest,
At times her steps are swift and rash;
She moving, at her girdle clasp
The golden keys of East and West.

The title poem, too, Demeter and Persephone, spoken by the distressed mother to her temporarily recovered daughter, is also full of such touches as here:—

A sudden nightingale
Saw thee, and flash'd into a frolic of song
And welcome; and a gleam as of the moon,
When first she peers along the tremulous deep,
Fled wavering o'er thy face, and chased away
That shadow of a likeness to the King
Of shadows, thy dark mate.

lest the naked glebe
Should yawn once more into the gulf, and thence
The shrilly whinnings of the team of Hell,
Ascending, pierce the glad and songful air,
And all at once their arch'd necks, midnight-maned,
Jet upward thro' the mid-day blossom.

Last as the likeness of a dying man,
Without his knowledge, from him flits to warn
A far-off friendship that he comes no more,
So he, the God of dreams, who heard my cry,
Drew from thyself the likeness of thyself
Without thy knowledge, and thy shadow past
Before me.

"Owd Roä" ("Old Rover"), which follows, is of a kind about which we have never been quite certain. We are not in the least afraid of dialect poems; but we are inclined to think that the very best poets, unless they are so entirely to the manner born as Burns was, should let them alone. Yet "Owd Roä" is good of its kind. The longest poem in the book, "The Ring," needs an argument to make it plain. It contains some splendid Tennysonianisms; but we own to a certain sympathy with the wicked heroine, Muriel, as compared with the good heroine, Miriam. In the first place, Muriel is a much prettier name than Miriam; and, in the second, we always do like the wicked heroines. Three other poems call for notice, however brief—"Happy," the contrast to "Forlorn," which tells how a leper's bride refused to be separated from him; the "Progress of Spring," a series of tableaux; and the touching "Romney's Remorse," apparently suggested by a reference in the late Mr. Edward Fitzgerald's letters.

To those who watch, with a humorous and yet reverent sympathy, the turns of human life, it will be a strangely interesting task to note how Mr. Browning's swan-song of Asolando reverts to his better style. There is here so little as to be almost nothing of the small mannerisms which have gained him the plaudits of fools, so much as to be almost everything of the large manner which has gained him the admiration of wise men—and women. No volume of his for a whole quarter of a century has contained so many poems, and hardly any, except Jocoseria, has contained even one such poem, of the kind which we indicated here last week as his masterpiece. Here we have at least half a dozen such, any one of which would make the fortune of an ordinary book of verse. Such are "Now," "Humility," "Summum Bonum," "A Pearl, a Girl," "Speculative," part of "Bad Dreams," and not a few more. It is difficult to pick out one, unfair to pick out too many; but let us give "Humility" and the first stanza of "A Pearl, a Girl":—

What girl but, having gathered flowers,
Striped the beds and spoilt the bowers,
From the lapful light she carries
Drops a careless bud?—nor carries
To regain the waif and stray:
"Store enough for home"—she'll say.

So say I too: give your lover
Heaps of loving—under, over,
Whelm him—make the one the wealthy!
Am I all so poor who—stealthy
Work it was!—picked up what fell:
Not the worst bud—who can tell?

A simple ring with a single stone,
To the vulgar eye no stone of price:
Whisper the right word, that alone—
Forth starts a sprite, like fire from ice,
And lo, you are lord (says an Eastern scroll)
Of heaven and earth, lord whole and sole
Through the power in a pearl.

The "Prologue" is fine, though a little melancholy in admitting the account of years. The "Epilogue" takes up the very spirit of "Prospice":—

One who never turned his back but marched breast forward,
Never doubted clouds would break,
Never dreamed, though right were worsted, wrong would triumph,
Held we fall to rise, are baffled to fight better,
Sleep to wake.

No, at noonday in the bustle of man's work-time
Greet the unseen with a cheer!
Bid him forward, breast and back as either should be,
"Strive and thrive!" cry "Speed,—flight on, fare ever
There as here!"

* Demeter; and other Poems. By Alfred Lord Tennyson, P.L., D.C.L. London: Macmillan. 1889.

Asolando. By Robert Browning. London: Smith, Elder, & Co. 1889.

The song "Rosny," which comes early, though of the same kidney as Mr. Browning's great early songs, from those in "Paracelsus" onwards, possesses a certain real "obscurity" which is quite different from the false obscurity assigned by the unintelligent to Mr. Browning's work. Its main purport is not sufficiently disengaged. "Which?" is more thoroughly in the old style, with the Duchesse, Marquise, and Comtesse each describing her ideal of a lover, and the Abbé deciding that

The love which to one, and one only, has reference Seems terribly like what perhaps gains God's preference.

And this is succeeded by other pieces showing the same startling combination of freshness and oldness—a combination which certain old fancies may, not foolishly, connect with the "lightning before death." The Pope who, Sixtus-like, answers the question

Why, Father, is the net removed? Son, it hath caught the fish is an old friend we are not tired of, and so is Sixtus himself enjoying a "bean-feast." But the number of such poems is too great for individual mention, although the whole volume does not reach the end of its second century of small pages. The best of the poems in the old "Men and Women" style is unquestionably "Beatrice Signorini," though we are inclined to think that Mr. Browning has left the tale half told. The next, "Flute Music, with an Accompaniment," is undeniably pretty, though the misjudgment which has so often waited on Mr. Browning is obvious in the praises which have sometimes been bestowed on it as a proof how smooth and liquid Mr. Browning can be:—

He. Ah, the bird-like fluting
Through the ash-tops yonder—
Bullfinch babbings, soft sounds suiting
What sweet thoughts I wonder?
Fine-pearled notes that surely Gather, dewdrop-fashion,
Deep-down in some heart which purely Secretes globuled passion—
Passion insuppressive—
Such is piped, for certain;
Love, no doubt, nay, love excessive
'Tis your ash-tops curtain.

We must leave to readers "Imperante Augusto natus est," "Development" (an excellent morality), and two singularly beautiful poems—"Rephan" and "Reverie"—in the most "thoughtful" style of the author, but not in that style in which "thoughtfulness" induces verbiage and mannerism. Indeed, the whole volume gives a very curious and delightful example of reversion late in life and work to the best characteristics of each. In hardly any one of his books—certainly in none for nearly a generation—has Mr. Browning put so many of his different qualities at his best as here.

Let us hope, in conclusion, that Asolando (asolare, to disport oneself in the sun, a neologism attributed to Cardinal Bembo) will soon be united to the rest of the author's works in an edition at once complete and compact. From the lowest point of view, it is certain that such an edition, parallel to that which now for more than ten years has been attainable with successive enlargements of Lord Tennyson's poems, would be successful—from the highest, it is equally certain that it ought to be given.

CLERGYMEN beware! "Rita" is attacking you. She says that you "eat, drink, and are merry, and" "keep a watchful eye on the loaves and fishes, yet all the while inveigh against the vanity of worldly pleasures and the deceitfulness of riches. For a class of men who invariably marry rich wives"—do not smile, reverend sirs, with large families and small incomes—"or wives with relatives possessed of interest in the matter of advowsons, this is somewhat inconsistent." You "preach humility, yet who bullies and works the poor curate as that same humility-preaching rector?" The squire's wife; but this only in passing. You ask for large offertories towards charities, and yourselves "contribute—prayers alone." This is a foul fib; but never mind. Oh, cries "Rita," "for a fan to purge, and a whirlwind to sweep away the monstrous accumulation of hypocrisy and false teaching that shames the very name of Christianity"—for instance, "such pharisaical forms as family prayers and regular church-going." "Neither church-going, nor district-visiting, nor early celebrations, nor the voice of many preachers; nay, sometimes not even the words of the Great Book itself"—nor eleven lines more suffice to complete an excited sentence, evidently levelled against everything in the shape of what most of our fellow-countrymen are pleased to consider orthodoxy. We waited, with the patience of a German, for the verb; but none came to the long string of nominative cases that composed the diatribe in question. With genuine religious difficulties and honest doubts wise men will always deal tenderly and charitably; on the other hand, all denominations of Christians, Agnostics, Deists, Atheists, and Pantheists might well agree in admiring a book that exposed cant and humbug in any or all religions; but when an author produces a novel apparently with the sole object of undermining the religious faiths of the greater proportion of the people speaking the language in which she writes, and offers nothing better in return than a sort of Esoteric Buddhism, and even that not good of its kind, she is likely to offend more readers than she pleases. "Rita" declaims against preaching. Few clergymen that we ever came across were fonder of preaching, or preached more drearily, than "Rita." To show that the Devil is not always quite so black as he is painted, she introduces a parson with some common sense among her characters; but he is evidently intended to serve as an exception, to prove the rule. Sheba is called "a study of girlhood." The girl, at thirteen, found no comfort to her "thinking, searching, thirsting soul" "in adoring incomprehensibility"—by which she meant what her father and mother called God, of whom she said that "the vast misery of earth did not seem to trouble Him," and wondered how He could "bear to gaze on so much woe, the results of a creation that ought to have been perfect, the outcome of what was planned and formed in His own image." Although she was what a certain divine once described as "weak on the Devil," she talked of his entering her soul, and having "a good time of it there." These are mere specimens of the sayings of this charming child. That some people may admire them, and think them clever, is likely enough; but it is well that those who may not should know what to expect if they send for this "study of girlhood." Unfortunately, this work has a moral, as well as a theological, aspect. We find the hero assuring the heroine that the antiquated prejudice against bigamy "is the cant of a hypocritical virtue that should have no place in" "her pure and candid soul." Indeed, Sheba's soul, "thinking, searching," and "thirsting" in the first volume, becomes flagrantly immoral in the third. "The full force and strength of a mighty passion" "swooped with giant force upon her soul, and wrapped her round with arms of fire." It is common enough to find serious sins against feminine virtue threatened in English novels; but the threat is seldom carried out. In Sheba the atrocities are actually committed, and are even dwelt upon with some gusto. To go through the list of them here would be as unnecessary as it would be unpleasant. We may, however, observe that the long description of the method employed by one of the principal characters to obtain a husband savours more of the pages of M. Zola than of a novel by an English writer. From a purely literary point of view there is some little to praise in Sheba. It is thoughtfully written; occasionally it is bright and crisp; a few bits, here and there, are amusing; yet the work in it is of very unequal merit, and worst of all, it has no ending—except that it stops. The author promises to finish it another time—that is to say, she threatens a sequel. All we can say is, that if there should be one, we hope it may be of a different flavour. Let it not be supposed that we are unappreciative of the charms of some of "Rita's" former novels; quite the contrary; but we judge each book entirely upon its own merits.

By way of violent contrast, we turn from Sheba to three Prize and Reward Books, published by the National Society, for good children. They are beautifully printed on excellent paper, and they are strongly bound, with bevelled edges, in bright, showy covers. The worst part of them is, perhaps, the pictures, which ought to be about the best in books for the young. The children of these days are lucky in having stories written for them by so able an author as Miss Frances M. Peard. Perhaps older people who have enjoyed her novels will not think themselves quite so fortunate when given one of her National Society Prize-Books in exchange for her adult romances—such, for instance, as that pretty book, Near Neighbours. To write any historical novel is more or less cramping; to write one for children is exceedingly so, and excuses should be made accordingly. Nevertheless, Miss Peard has produced an interesting story, highly suitable for girls about the middle of their 'teens; and we think it will also be enjoyed by not a few boys, who will probably consider its prodigious wealth in hairbreadth escapes and singular coincidences rather an advantage than otherwise. As to the literary merits of the work, which unquestionably exist, we may observe that it could scarcely have been a superhuman effort to put down a few leading facts about some old town that happened to interest one, such as—Chester. Rows; walls; abbey (therefore formerly monks); celebrated for its miracle plays; once devastated by plague; the racecourse, or Roodee (formerly Rood-eye); town once visited by King Henry VII.; and then to make some such notes as these:—Take date of King Henry's visit for beginning of story for National Society's Prize-Book; observe expulsion of Flemings during his reign; make hero Fleming, and hide him about in curious old alleys and rows; then make him fly country, eventually to return and marry heroine; heroine to act in miracle play before Henry VII., and nurse patients during plague; plague not at proper date, explain in note. In those times belief in witchcraft; introduce witch; make her curse. Curfew bell; ring it often. Always say "an" instead of "if," so as to make the characters appear to use the lingo of the period. With this material fill 296 pages, and then—Finis! Now this sort of thing is all very well, and Miss Peard has done her work satisfactorily; but it must not be mistaken for historical romance, in the higher sense of the word. It would be just as easy to take the next town—Shrewsbury. Wars of the Roses; Owen Glendyr, Shelton's Oak, Harry Hotspur, Battle of Shrewsbury, Haugh-mond Hill, &c.—and so on with all the historic towns in England, making a child's prize-book out of each. We wish it to be distinctly understood that we make these remarks solely in the interest of Miss Peard. She writes a children's historical story nicely—very nicely indeed; but we are anxious that those who have only read her school prize-books should not fall into the error of supposing that she can do nothing better, or that they are the special work for which Providence has designed her. Far from it!

Maud Florence Nellie; or, Don't Care, is a regular girls' story-book, and no novel and water. The heroine does not marry or even fall in love, nor is there any marrying worth mentioning from cover to cover. It is almost needless to say that it contains the equivalent of marriage invariably to be found in children's books—a death-bed; for, as everybody knows, the heroes in books suited to people under fifteen end by dying, while those in books for people over fifteen end by marrying. Some stolen diamonds and a good deal of Sunday School help to fill up this improving volume. "Don't Care," in this instance, just avoids coming "to a bad end" by a sort of quasi-reformation, which, judging from the evidence adduced, we do not think would be likely to be very lasting. The three conversions, again, seem to us a trifle sudden, but it is to be hoped that the juvenile readers of Maud Florence Nellie may find them none the less edifying.

A capital specimen of a book for girls is Banning and Blessing, by the author of The Atelier du Lys. Here, again, there is no love-making; on the other hand, undue prominence is not given to the inevitable death-bed. Like The Blue Dragon, it contains a witch, who curses freely, but takes to blessing on the last page. Here, a stolen entry from a parish-register takes the place of the stolen diamonds in Maud Florence Nellie. You must have a stolen something as well as a death-bed if you want to write a loveless story-book of any bulk. The leading incident in Banning and Blessing is the discovery of an heir, or rather heiress, to a baronet and all his goods. The plot is well worked out; there is considerable individuality, variety, and contrast in the characters, and the descriptions of scene are pretty in some cases and forcible in others. The events are supposed to have taken place early in the century, apparently in Devonshire, and the author seems to have had Dartmoor and its neighbourhood in her mind. Quaint little bits, redolent of old times, are constantly to be met with throughout the volume, such as Sir Julian's complaint that his Vicar had sold the old parish registers to the grocer for waste paper; Lady Brent's speech, "When I was twelve years old my governess used to make me stand in the stocks for an hour before breakfast, and all the rest of the day I wore a backboard and a collar with iron spikes to make me hold my head up"; and the cool admission of the old clerk to the new Rector:—

"Many's the time I've heard a stone thrown at my window at night, and I would just reach out the keys and ask no question. [These were the keys of the church, in the charnel-vault of which smugglers used to hide kegs of brandy.] I knew they'd be brought back safe enough, and may be, as you know, a little keg of spirits would be in Passon Ashe's wood-stack next day, and another in mine."

There are symptoms of smuggling, again, when the two little girls are out alone on the moor at night, in order to warn the witch that an attempt is to be made to burn her alive in her straw-thatched cabin:—

A distant thunderous sound was heard. Some instinct made Cicely pull Lucy up the precipitous bank; the next instant a troop of horses rushed by, each with a keg slung under it by a single girth, riderless, but led by a dappled mare, flying in front. They flashed past and were out of sight in a moment, and even the sound of their hoofs died away as the girls, unable to keep their footing on the steep and slippery turf, slid down again. "Well!" said Cicely, much excited, "I'm glad to have seen that! I've heard how the smugglers when they're hard run send off their horses alone with that mare to lead them, all shaved and soaped they are so that the revenue men can get no hold of them. There's been a smart brush to-night somewhere, you may depend on it."

We think that some oldish children may find Banning and Blessing far from unreadable.

As its name implies, there is banning, again, in The Curse of Carne's Hold; but blessing is conspicuous by its absence. Here we have love as well, and it cannot be called a child's book, although boys may enjoy its hairbreadth escapes, which rival in number those of The Blue Dragon itself. If we were in a particular hurry we might dispose of this book with the criticism—battle, murder, and sudden death; but, as it happens, we can afford to say a little more about it. First, we should recommend people in whose families there is any taint of lunacy not to read it. If they do it will certainly make them uncomfortable, and possibly make them ill. It begins well, and that is one of the most necessary factors of success in all literary work. Unfortunately it does not go on well. The opening chapters about the curse, the ball, and the murder, are good enough, and there are symptoms of originality which make us expect great things as we proceed. It is a disappointment to be let down into the society of the eternal detective policeman of fiction, and to be made to wade through the mire of a fictitious inquest and a fictitious trial. When two-thirds of the first volume have been finished the story stops with a sudden jolt. We are then carried off to the Kafir War of 1850, which is only connected with the earlier portion of the novel by the fact that the hero takes part in it. In this part of the novel the skirmishes, battles, raids and adventures, which might be an imitation of the style of Mr. Rider

Haggard when at the exact opposite of his best, follow each other in such rapid succession as to become monotonous. In the third part of the novel, when the scene is removed to Carne's Hold and its neighbourhood again, the first and the second parts are welded together, and out of the whole a by no means uninteresting plot is manufactured. There is nothing very new in the trick of pretending to take the reader into confidence at an early stage of the story and then "selling" him; but to play off this trick well is not so easy as might be supposed, and here the author does it very cleverly. We never met with a novelist who was so fond of administering beef-tea as Mr. Henty. He gives it on three different occasions in The Curse of Carne's Hold to women who have had "shocks." Well, he could give them nothing better!

LETTERS OF THE DUKE OF WELLINGTON TO MISS J.*

THIS is a thoroughly delightful book. It ought to be, and no doubt will be, a joy to all who can appreciate the representation of character, or who can taste the peculiar dry and nutty flavour of the Duke of Wellington's epistolary style. We have no doubt whatever that it is all quite genuine, that there was a Miss J., and that the Duke of Wellington wrote to her. If we are being hoaxed, and any man jeers at us for it, we shall reply that the discovery delights us; for in that case the world will be the richer in Mrs., or Miss, Christine Terhume Herrick for a writer with an altogether amazing knowledge of human nature, insight into character, and power of imitating style.

The Miss J. of this book (from some indications given by the editor it would probably not be difficult to discover her real name) was a "fair saint." In a happier time she would certainly have been a nun, and not improbably have become a saint in the regular official way. As it was, she was born in England in the first quarter of this century, and could only be a gushing young lady of a strong pietistic and evangelical turn. Her faculty for the part of Catherine of Siena could find no better employment than incessant attempts to arouse her friends and relations to "a new birth unto righteousness," efforts to bring hardened criminals to repentance, and seventeen years of strenuous effort to convert the Duke of Wellington. The editor tells the strange history of this last adventure partly from the letters and partly from Miss J.'s own copious diary. It is, indeed, a curious story. The young lady wrote to the Duke in 1834 on the state of his soul, and not only drew "Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington," which it was easy enough to do in a way, but so interested this wary old man of the world that he began a correspondence which lasted till his death. The fact that Miss J. was young and handsome may have had some influence on the Duke, who was, as all men know, very susceptible; but, after all, it was her letters which induced him to call on her, and he continued to take an interest in her, in spite of hysteria, impertinence, and explosions of temper, long after she had ceased to be young and had become a confirmed invalid. They had many quarrels, and made them up. At the end there was a serious breach—caused, alas! by a question of money—in which, however, there does not appear to have been any greed on Miss J.'s part, only hysteria and folly, while on the Duke's there was a generosity which would have been most willing to show itself if only it had been allowed to do so by the amazing wrongheadedness of his correspondent. So much for the skeleton of the story. What is more interesting than these dry bones is the character of Miss J. She was, as we have said, a "fair saint," very anxious to serve the cause of Heaven, but equally anxious that it should be served by Miss J. As there was no opening for the founding of an Order, she fell back on a scheme to become Duchess of Wellington, in order that she might be "a city set on a hill which cannot be hid" for the general good of this nation. She was, as she words it, "permitted to love the Duke." Unfortunately the Duke was not permitted to love her. When she unfolded this notable scheme His Grace replied, "The commands of all others, which we ought to obey, are those dictated by our social relations. What would be said if I, a man of seventy years of age, nearly, were to take in marriage a lady young enough to be my granddaughter?" On this Miss J. has a comment to make. "Alas! alas! [the young lady had a young-lady-like love of italics] how deceitful is the human heart! For I am convinced that, although the Duke wrote thus, there was not a moment during our acquaintance when, if I had not been by the Grace of God what I was and am, that he would have thought I was too young to bow down before me with the most sinful adulation." Miss J., who was not without spiritual pride by any means, might have been, as she told the Duke, not only virtuous, but RIGHTEOUS, but her innocence was not that of ignorance. Quite the contrary. She was prompt to conclude that the Duke's intentions were not "strictly honourable" when she reflected on the details of their first conversation. On this occasion, by the way, she prayed "God to be with me every moment of the time, directing even my dress. This He did, letting me be dressed on the occasion as HE pleased, which, as my Diary relates, was in my old turned dark-green merino gown, daily worn—not permitting me to be decorated in any way likely to attract notice, which, as the employment in view was of so sacred a nature, was neither required nor obtained." The interview, of which we have only the lady's account, was indeed a religious courtship. But on reflection, and when her suspicions had been stimulated by an innocent-looking sentence in one of the Duke's notes, the lady flamed up. The truth flashed on her in the watches of the night, and putting on her dressing-gown, as she carefully records, she wrote him a letter, protesting her virtue and her righteousness, and rebuking the World-victor's victor in no measured terms for his dishonourable intentions. The amazing thing is that the Duke answered meekly that nobody was more impressed than himself with "veneration for your virtues, attainments, and Sentiments." They made it up, and then the lady picked another quarrel; and again the Duke was the soul of reasonableness, and they made it up; and so it went on till the end. When they had been acquainted in this strange way for some years, Miss J. records in her Diary a little passage which is almost delicious. The Duke called, and in the course of conversation she asked him about a recent accident to his knee from which he had suffered:—

When I did so, he appeared delighted, brushing up his chair nearer to me, which of course met with the withdrawal on my part due to Christianity. I bless God for the grace and strength afforded me on that occasion, causing the Duke to sink into the utmost insignificance in comparison with His favor (sic) which is better than life.

The quotation ought, we imagine, to sufficiently place the lady.

It may not appear quite in keeping with the hard character of the Duke that he should have allowed himself to be entangled in a correspondence with a person who might have become exceedingly compromising—who, in any case, must have been an insufferable bore after a time, and should have meekly borne being lectured, reproached, and scolded for years. As a matter of fact, however, the improbability is only superficial. The Duke was just the man to feel that, having once begun a correspondence, it was not becoming to break it off merely out of a care for his own comfort. The kindness and piety of a soldierly but genuine kind which lay below his hard surface made him accept Miss J. among the other worries of life. He did rebel at times, when the lady was in a tantrum, and then he would remind her that the best way to avoid the slights she complained of was to drop the correspondence, but he was always worried into beginning again. It is a fact, too, that the Duke liked letter-writing. As he was a man of downright honesty, with small sense of humour in spite of his dry ironical wit, the absurdity of his correspondent probably did not greatly trouble him. But our belief that the letters are genuine is based on internal evidence. They are either Wellington's or the work of somebody with an actual genius for imitation—and such a person would assuredly have done more than is in this book. Here, for instance, is a letter which is either by Wellington or Diabolus:—

My dear Miss J.—I have received your letter of the 31st, and I am really much concerned to learn that I have created a feeling of displeasure in your Mind by having omitted to notice the Inconvenience which you felt upon your Journey to Harrowgate.

There is always Inconvenience in travelling in a Stage Coach. It cannot be otherwise. Indeed it is wonderful that there should be so little; and I must observe that there is less of a physical and personal Nature in travelling in this Manner in England than elsewhere. The Inconvenience felt in England is of a moral and mental description. It is formed of the trash and nonsense which a traveller is condemned to hear in these vehicles; because everybody talks; and says not what he thinks but what the fancy of the moment suggests. For this which was the particular Inconvenience which you suffered upon this Journey there is no remedy but Patience; and I would add Silence.

You would practise neither. You would not sit patiently and hear the stupid Irreligion of the Talker; you would reply to Him; and this occasioned much of the Annoyance which occurred.

Here is a Wellingtonian gem à propos of this same unlucky journey:—"I don't consider with you that it is necessary to enter into a disputation with every wandering Blasphemer—much must depend upon the circumstances." Again, there never was but one person in the world who wrote such a letter as this:—

The Duke did not say anything upon the letter which Miss J. had written to the Gentleman in question because he was unwilling to obtrude his opinion upon a matter which Miss J. considers one of Duty; in which the Duke is so unfortunate as to differ in opinion with her.

Prudence and Discretion would appear to require that Miss J. should not rebuke a Gentleman for words spoken not to Her; not even in Her Presence; but to Her Landlady, in the relation of a Lodger in the House.

The Duke may be wrong. But he considers the exercise of Prudence and discretion virtues; not unbecoming to any character, however exalted.

An admirable Wellingtonian touch is to be found in a letter in which the Duke declines to forward a long screed by Miss J., expostulating anonymously with the Queen Dowager for declining to pay rates for her jointure house. The Duke explains the position, and adds:—"You will see it is the Parish, and not the Queen which has contravened the Lord." Nobody but Arthur Wellesley ever attained to these comic effects by sheer dint of stating the fact in explicit language. As the book goes on we get less of the Duke and more of Miss J., but it keeps its interest to the end. It is, as far as the Duke is concerned, at least, one more proof that Lord Tennyson was inspired when he prophesied that "whatever records leap to light, He never shall be shamed."

A MANUAL OF FORESTRY.*

THIS book is a great deal more than what is implied by a manual, and the volume under review is the first only of a work on forestry, a much neglected subject, which ought to be of importance and value. It is evident that the original, true, and legal meaning of the word forest must be given up, and the tree acceptance of the term must be adopted, in conformity with public opinion. Dr. Schlich begins in his introduction with definitions, and quotes four definitions, only one of which, the third, can be said to be correct:—"Third definition—'a forest is a piece of land which is subject to special forest laws and regulations.'" Not satisfied with these four definitions, he supplies his own, which must be accepted for the purpose of this work:—"The area, which is for the most part set aside for the production of timber and other forest produce, or which is expected to exercise certain climatic effects, or to protect the locality against injurious influences; such areas are frequently subject to special forest laws and regulations." Then, drawing a distinction between forests and woods, he proceeds to define the term wood:—"Under a wood or woodland (Plantation) is understood an area of defined dimensions, which is stocked with trees or shrubs, and managed for the production of timber, firewood, and such other produce which ordinarily accompanies the rearing of trees." "Every 'wood' is, therefore, a 'forest,' but not every forest is a wood." Let Dr. Schlich's own definitions stand good, as far as they go, for the purpose of forestry.

This first volume treats of "The Utility of Forests and Fundamental Principles of Sylviculture." Forestry, it is presumed, is the general term, and sylviculture the special term, for the culture of trees. "Although forestry has been practised for centuries in Great Britain and Ireland, this particular branch of industry did not receive much attention in the United Kingdom until questions connected with the administration of the forests in India brought it into more prominent notice" (Preface). That is to say, we planted trees in all directions, but neglected the science and art of forestry, so that when we required men to manage the forests in India we had to send them to France and Germany for instruction in forestry. Dr. Schlich, however, was deputed in 1885 to organize a school of forestry at Cooper's Hill, and was instructed to draw up handbooks. These volumes, which he calls a manual—forgetting that "handbook" and "manual" are the same thing—are the result of his studies in England, Scotland, Ireland, Germany, Austria, France, and Switzerland.

Dr. Schlich divides his subject into seven parts, Parts I. and II. constituting this first volume. These Parts consist of—I. The Utility of Forests. II. Fundamental Principles of Sylviculture. III. Creation, Regeneration, and Tending of Woods. IV. Forest Protection. V. Forest Utilization. VI. Forest Working Plans. VII. Forest Finance. In forestry, the stool of a tree is that part which remains in the ground after a tree has been felled. The bole means the stem, or true timber; and the crown means the whole system of branches. A "Pure Wood (or Forest) means a wood which consists of one species only." A "Mixed Wood (or Forest) means a wood which consists of two or more species intermixed." He also divides his trees into two principal classes for sylviculture—the shade-bearing species and the light-demanding species:—

The following scale is that given by Gayer; it begins with the most light-demanding species and finishes with the most shade-bearing:—

- (1) Larch, Birch.
- (2) Scotch Pine, Aspen, Willow.
- (3) Oak, Ash, Sweet Chestnut, Mountain Pine.
- (4) Elm, Common Alder, Lime, Weymouth Pine, Maple.
- (5) Spruce, Hornbeam.
- (6) Beech.
- (7) Silver Fir.
- (8) Yew.—P. 118.

And these are the trees concerning which he chiefly writes as denizens of European forests.

Part I. treats of the utility of forests, direct and indirect. The direct utility is conspicuous enough in the various uses to which wood of all sorts and sizes is put. The indirect utility may be said to have been almost ignored, except in the case of ornamental tree-planting and game coverts. Section 2 of Part I. treats fully of the indirect utility of forests, especially in Great Britain and Ireland and in India; the effects on the air and soil, on the humidity and water-supply, on the hygienic effects, and on the æsthetic effects. This branch of the subject surely demands the most serious consideration; and, although there is a Department of Woods and Forests in the State, it seems to have been the last to attract any attention whatever in this fully-populated country. The common agriculturist is a bitter enemy to trees, and it is high time that the indirect utility of forests should be made manifest. On a former occasion we congratulated the world on the taking up of forestry as a subject for study by the Royal Agricultural Society, and we wish them good speed—not speed the plough exactly—in that direction. A great deal of good work is done in this volume towards elucidating this more or less obscure topic. The results of experiments in Germany have been published by Dr. E. Ebermeyer in his Die physikalischen Einwirkungen des Waldes auf Luft und Boden, and Professor Dr. R. Weber in his introduction to the Handbuch der Forstwissenschaft, edited by

* A Manual of Forestry. By William Schlich, Ph.D., Principal Professor of Forestry at the Royal Indian Engineering College, Cooper's Hill, late Inspector-General of Forests to the Government of India.

Dr. T. Lorey, 1888. These two works have been specially utilized by Dr. Schlich; and, after a good and full explanation of the state of the case, he gives a summary of conclusions under twelve heads, enumerating the utility, direct and indirect, of forests:—

- (1) Forests supply timber, fuel, and other forest produce.
- (2) They offer a convenient opportunity for the investment of capital.
- (3) They produce a demand for labour in their management and working, as well as in a variety of industries which depend on forests for their raw material.
- (4) They reduce the temperature of the air and soil to a moderate extent, and render the climate more equable.
- (5) They increase the relative humidity of the air and tend to reduce evaporation.
- (6) They tend to increase the rainfall.
- (7) They help to regulate the water supply, ensure a more sustained feeding of springs, tend to reduce violent floods, and render the flow of water in rivers more continuous.
- (8) They assist in preventing landslips, avalanches, the silting up of rivers and low lands, and arrest moving sands.
- (9) They reduce the velocity of air currents, protect adjoining fields against cold or dry winds, and afford shelter to cattle, game, and useful birds.
- (10) They assist in the production of oxygen and of ozone.
- (11) They may, under certain conditions, improve the healthiness of a country, and under other conditions endanger it.
- (12) Finally, they increase the artistic beauty of a country.

It will be seen that the first three give the direct utility, pretty well known to all; and the last nine the indirect utility, by no means well known. The importance of the future supply of valuable timber is recognized in some countries, though not in all. For example, in India as the forests are cleared teak is planted afresh, and in Sweden the fir is planted as the wood is cut, both for the direct and indirect utility of the forests.

Part II. is divided into four chapters, and treats of sylviculture. The scheme of the whole work is very systematic, with its parts, chapters, sections, divisions and subdivisions, and it is well arranged for the student for whom it is intended. In sylviculture there are varieties of forests and woods, as there are varieties of trees, suitable or unsuitable for the purposes for which particular trees are grown, and it is evident that there is much to be said from many points of view. If an ordinary field crop fail for want of good management, a year is the most that is lost, but the failure of a wood plantation may not be discovered for twenty-five years. If height-growth is required, trees must be planted near together; the lateral branches fall off from crowding, and a long clean stem or bole is produced. If volume-growth—these are the terms used—is required, the trees should have more room, and be carefully thinned; the branches then spread, and a thick shorter stem or bole is the result. The volume-growth (of wood) per acre varies with the different species, and silver fir is stated to afford the greatest volume in an acre in a hundred and twenty years; a length of time which gives a respectable air to forestry, and would make the speculators on the Stock Exchange look aghast. The Scotch pine seems to be a favourite tree in forestry, and it takes a hundred to a hundred and twenty years to become timber, when it should be 100 feet high. The silver fir makes the most wood in volume in that time, the spruce next, and the Scotch pine third. The additions made to the soil by the fall of the leaf, dropped-off branches, and other forest débris are called the humus, and this humus greatly improves the soil for sylviculture or any other culture, except culture par excellence. The roots of trees do not extend to more than 3 to 4 feet below the surface, and the stability of the tree depends on the sort of holding the roots can get.

We look forward to the future volumes for many particulars of forestry not yet reached in this first volume of the work, and we hope to find the various uses to which the timber, the leaves, the fruit, and the bark of the different trees in different countries are put fully described in the volumes to come. Some botanical details of the flower, male and female, and the seed of trees would be of great interest. It is rather surprising to read (p. 173) that beech seed-years are produced only after intervals of six to ten years, and oak, spruce, &c., every three to five years. Is the common beechmast only good for seed in any quantity every six to ten years?

The time required for forestry is so long that in many cases it would appear to be the proper function of Government to perform such a necessary work, especially in regard to the indirect utility of forests. But the management of the Royal forests in this country by the department of Woods and Forests is not encouraging, though in India much good has been done by Government there, and this work itself is evidence of the importance which the officials of India attach to the science and art of forestry.

This volume has not an index, but there is a full table of contents. It is a business-like, readable volume of 232 pages, which we can strongly recommend. And we hope the completion of the work will be attended with the success it deserves.

BARNSTAPLE DURING THE CIVIL WAR.*

WITHOUT the aid of some local narrative it is difficult to gain an adequate idea of the character of the Great Civil War, or of the effect which it had on men's daily lives. It was by no means a war simply of ordered battles, in which the commands were held by leaders of mark, or of sieges of populous and wealthy cities. In most districts, for longer or shorter periods, the quarrel between the King and the Parliament led to petty warfare between villages and near neighbours, to a welter of confusion out of which it is difficult to form any coherent story, to marches, skirmishes, and leaguers which at first sight seem scarcely worth recording. Yet it is, as every reader of the volume before us will, we think, acknowledge, well to have these matters told us by a competent historian. They have a value of their own, for they help to make up a complete picture of the war; and, though some of them were certainly without any important result, others had a direct bearing on greater events. Indeed, the more closely we study the course of the war in some defined area, the clearer the general history becomes to us; necessary links are supplied, and military movements are invested with new meaning. For study of this kind Mr. Cotton's book affords an admirable opportunity. It should, of course, be read side by side with Dr. Gardiner's History of the Great Civil War, and it will help the reader to appreciate the excellence of Dr. Gardiner's work; he will see that, while considerations of space and proportion have obliged the historian of the war as a whole to omit or pass lightly over many local details, he has made himself master of them, and has used his knowledge with skill and judgment. Mr. Cotton has chosen a fruitful subject for his investigations; for, though Barnstaple itself was scarcely a place of first-rate importance, its story between 1642 and 1646 almost necessarily includes the events of the war in North Devon, and these are well worth telling, both for their own sake and for the place which they hold in the general history of the period. While treating local matters with a minuteness only possible to the local historian, he has not treated them in a merely local spirit, but has shown the relation in which they stand to affairs of national interest.

In North Devon, as in Somerset, the trading towns took the side of the Parliament, and Barnstaple, though it contained some Royalists, was not an exception to this rule. One of the members of the borough, George Peard, a strong Puritan, and the mover of the resolution for printing the Grand Remonstrance, had great influence with the leading inhabitants, and Barnstaple contributed largely to the expenses of the war. Although at first the Corporation had so little idea of what lay before them that they authorized the Mayor to spend 10*l.* on the fortifications of the town, they soon laid out more than 2,200*l.* on various military works, among which was the repair of the Castle. This castle occupied a mound once probably crowned by some rude fort of early days. To this succeeded a shell-keep built by Judhael of Totnes, who was, as his name shows, a Breton, and not a "powerful Norman," as he is described here. In the Earl of Bath the town had a near neighbour who seemed for a time likely to cause it some trouble; but his attempt to enforce the Commission of Array was defeated by a riot at South Molton, and his estates were soon afterwards sequestered for delinquency. More formidable foes soon appeared, and Barnstaple took a leading part in the struggle between the counties of Devon and Cornwall. In consequence of the movements of the Cornish army under Sir Ralph Hopton and Sir Bevil Grenville, the garrison was reinforced by a number of the county Militia, and troops sent out by the town—"neere 1,000 Horse and Foot"—attacked with doubtful success a detachment of Hopton's army at Torrington. Towards the end of January 1643 a Barnstaple contingent took part in the skirmish at Chagford, where Sidney Godolphin, "that young gentleman of incomparable parts," was shot, and about three weeks later, when the Royalists were threatening Plymouth, a body of Barnstaple and Bideford men led the attack on the two regiments stationed at Modbury under Sir Nicholas Slanning and Colonel Trevanion. In this engagement, which is not mentioned by Clarendon, and has been transferred by the editor of the Trevelyan Papers (Camden Society) to Marlborough, the Parliamentarians were completely successful. While it was in progress a vigorous sortie was made from Plymouth on Hopton's works, and "the immediate result of these operations was the raising of the siege." At the conclusion of a short armistice Hopton made a determined effort to lead his army to the help of the King, who had failed to relieve Reading and was in some danger at Oxford. Colonel Chudleigh, who was in command of a local army, defeated him at Sourton Down "by night in a great tempest of wind and rain," and penned his troops in the northern corner of Cornwall about Launceston, where they soon found themselves short of provisions. Hopton extricated himself by his victory at Stratton, where the Devon men behaved badly, and advanced into Somerset without meeting further opposition. In spite of the loss which the Royalists sustained in the death of Sir Bevil Grenville, we can scarcely agree with Mr. Cotton that the Parliamentarians had, on the whole, the advantage at Lansdown; Waller's works were taken and he was forced to retire to Bath. The battle of Roundway Down and the surrender of Bristol gave the King for a time the ascendancy in the West, and Colonel Digby was sent with a small body of men to complete the reduction of North Devon. Barnstaple and Bideford joined forces, and their army tried to surprise him at Torrington; but, though their troops greatly outnumbered the enemy, they were routed without having made any stand. The Barnstaple Corporation at once set about strengthening their town. They might, however, have spared themselves the expense; for they had not the heart to make any use of their fine new fortifications, and, on receiving a summons from Prince Maurice, who was then near Exeter, promptly agreed to his terms, carrying their submission so far as to assure him that "our intentions have always been, are now, and by the grace of God ever shall be real to Live in all due obedience to his Mat^e and y^e Laws of y^e Land, and to submit to y^e discipline of the Church of England established by Lawe." The surrender took place on September 2, 1643.

In the following June Maurice incautiously withdrew part of the small garrison stationed at Barnstaple, and the townsmen, knowing that Essex was advancing into the West, revolted to the Parliament. Maurice, who was then engaged in escorting the Queen into Cornwall, threatened to sack and burn the town, and detached Digby to retake it. This time the Barnstaple men behaved with considerable gallantry, and though Digby's troops made their way into the town, fought with them in the streets, and finally drove them out. Some curious contemporary notices are given of this preservation of Barnstaple from the "Irish and French," as Maurice's soldiers are called, his army having been joined, as Mr. Cotton notes, by a large body of Irish under Lord Inchiquin, and being partly made up of the Queen's French regiment. Mr. Cotton proves that the historians of the county have done less than justice to the Barnstaple men by asserting that Digby's attack was repulsed by, or with the help of, a detachment from the army of Essex; the town was defended by its own inhabitants, and no reinforcement was received from Essex until some days later, when Lord Roberts arrived with a garrison. While he was in the town he hanged a prisoner named Howard or Hayward, who had been an officer in the Parliamentary army, and had deserted to the King. Other Devon men had done the same. Colonel Chudleigh, the victor at Sourton Down, and Captain Thomas Drake, and a considerable number of officers and men had gone over to the King's side after the fight at Stratton. Poor Hayward's death made some stir, and in retaliation a sea-captain, named Turpin, was hanged at Exeter by Sir John Berkeley. It is strange that during the time that Barnstaple was held for the Parliament no attempt was made to repair the defences; "more than half the guns remained unmounted, and lying on the quays." Yet danger was not far off, for Sir Francis Dodington, "that bloody wolf," Nehemiah Wallington calls him, attacked Ilfracombe within a dozen miles of Barnstaple, and burnt some part of the town. At the end of about three months Barnstaple again changed hands. After Essex's disaster in Cornwall it was summoned by Goring, and was surrendered without a blow. It was stipulated that the town should not be occupied by a garrison. A condition of this kind was generally only observed so long as it did not interfere with the interests of the party in power; and some disturbances, for which the Mayor and Corporation were called to account by Sir John Berkeley, then "Colonel-General of Devon and Cornwall," gave a fair reason for subjecting Barnstaple to military occupation. Sir Allen Apsley, the Royalist Governor, was a vigorous officer, and bitter, and evidently exaggerated, stories about his tyranny were published in London. He at once set about strengthening the defences of the town, and carried on the work with so much thoroughness and expedition that in two months' time Sir Edward Hyde declared that Barnstaple "was the most miraculously fortified place" that he knew. It was, therefore, determined to send the Prince of Wales thither when he was forced to leave Bristol on account of the plague. A few notices are given of his residence at Barnstaple, where he was entertained by a widow named Grace Beale, who "dressed all his meat," and lent him money. As far as North Devon is concerned, the remainder of the war was marked by few incidents of any interest. The King's cause in the West suffered from the rascality of Goring and the selfish insubordination of Richard Grenville, and the Devonshire clubmen declared for the Parliament, for they had less to fear from the army of Fairfax than from Goring's undisciplined cavalry. Meanwhile Fairfax, having gained nearly all Somerset, was making sure, if somewhat slow, progress in Devonshire. Soon after Hopton had accepted the command of the Prince's army he marched to Torrington, apparently in order to secure Barnstaple "as a basis of operations for the relief of Exeter." There Fairfax routed his army in a battle of which Mr. Cotton gives a lucid and animated account. Fairfax followed him into Cornwall, where before long he was forced to capitulate. Before leaving Torrington Fairfax detached a force under Colonel Cook "to block up" Barnstaple. This force consisted chiefly of cavalry, for Fairfax intended that it should cut off any of the Royalist Horse which might escape his pursuit. There was no need to press the siege of Barnstaple; its fall was certain, and all that was immediately necessary was to prevent its small garrison from receiving reinforcements from Hopton's routed army. Nevertheless one assault was made upon the town, and Mr. Cotton points out that Blake, who was then engaged in besieging Dunster Castle, brought his regiment to Barnstaple and joined in the attack. It is possible that some point in the external defences was carried, but "no actual lodgment was effected," and the attempt was virtually a failure. This incident, which is recorded in the tract Sir Thomas Fairfaxes Letter, &c., seems to have escaped the notice of all Blake's biographers. After a blockade of seven weeks the town was surrendered, and Barnstaple changed hands for the fourth and last time on April 14, 1646. With its surrender the war in the West practically ended.

A MANUAL OF CONJURING.*

MR. HOFFMANN is something more than a brilliant conjurer. He has invented a large number of clever tricks, and has enormously improved many old ones; and he has written two of the most useful and entertaining of the many manuals of conjuring. It is eleven years since he published Modern Magic, which is still the indispensable text-book alike of the amateur wizard and of the curious inquirer who takes a scientific interest in the noble art of conjuring. But in these matters eleven years is a generation, and Modern Magic has fallen a little behind the time. It is excellent so far as it goes; but it does not go far enough, as this new volume of more than 450 pages demonstrates. During the last eleven years a great deal has happened in the conjuring world. Many of the old performers have dropped out of sight, some of them overwhelmed by the new developments of their art; and at least one man of the first mark has died. The days of ponderous appliances have vanished, and science has taken their place. The new tricks nearly all show the same tendency to simplicity, brilliance, and finish. Even "palming," the most essential, yet the most difficult, art of the conjurer, has improved; and now more than ever the success of a great variety of tricks depends upon the address and dexterity of the performer and upon his accomplishment in sleight of hand. And hereon there is a very curious observation to be made. For long generations it has been the fashion to account for the sudden disappearance of objects handled by the conjurer by the conviction that they had gone "up his sleeve." Now, as a fact, the older conjurers but rarely caused things to vanish in that way. But of late the sleeve has been largely employed as a vanishing point; and thus, after many days, the olden suspicion has found its justification. But we must not divulge the secrets of the prison-house.

Mr. Hoffmann's new book, like the old one, is primarily intended for the guidance of the juvenile conjurer, but a large proportion of the tricks he describes are quite beyond any but the most accomplished of amateurs. For the benefit of those who are unacquainted with his earlier manual he might have insisted rather more upon the importance of palming, both as a means to an end and as an art in itself. For no man who is not a clever palmer will ever make a good conjurer. And it must needs be remarked that the palmer is quite as much born as made. There are types of hand which will not permit of good palming. Of such is the squat, fat, short-fingered hand. A long slender hand, not too plump, with elongated pointed fingers and a capacious palm, is the best type. Some information about the hands of conjurers would be of real utility to students of sleight of hand.

Conjuring feats differ so widely, some are so simple and others so complex, that it is impossible to compare them inter se. All we can do is to compare the methods of different professors in performing the same trick. Mr. Hoffmann has, therefore, wisely refrained from laying down the law as to the best and the worst classes of tricks. Every spectator will continue to hug his preferences; the more especially since an apparently simple trick is often very difficult, and only to be presented by the aid of complicated apparatus. But it is clear that an effective trick, performed without accessories, and depending solely upon dexterity and address, belongs to a higher department of conjuring than one which requires a great deal of that baggage without which wizards of the old school were unhappy. Conjurers do not now carry about with them, as Professor Anderson, "the Wizard of the North," was wont to do, seven tons or so of baggage. Yet there never was a time when tricks which are worked as much by the aid of machinery as by manual dexterity were so numerous and so effective. Of late years there has been a constant increase in the number of more or less effective tricks with cards; yet most of those achievements compel the use of mechanical accessories. Of all really elaborate conceptions in conjuring it may be roundly said that they would be impossible without machinery. Of such is M. Buatier de Kolta's "Vanishing Lady," one of the neatest and most finished mystifications that has been produced of late. Mr. Hoffmann tells how that mystification is worked; and the curious student of legerdemain has probably guessed for himself pretty much "how it is done." But we are not going to spoil the pleasure of M. Buatier's audiences and of Mr. Hoffmann's readers by telling tales out of school. What we should have liked Mr. Hoffmann to tell us is the secret of the most surprising of all M. Buatier's conceptions—the Cocoon trick, in which a very charming young person is produced from a sort of chrysalis, apparently far too flat and narrow to conceal even the sylph half of whose form appears from out of it. A less adroit performer would probably have "given away" his secret before now; but M. Buatier's surety of hand and eye is such that it is impossible for all save the most expert to form even a tenable opinion upon the ways and means of that brilliant performance.

There are now so many tricks with cards, and some of them are so brilliant and effective, that Mr. Hoffmann has done well to describe them in some detail. These feats are excellently suited to the amateur burning to distinguish himself in the drawing-room. With a large number of them no apparatus is required, and, once mastered, they are simple and may be performed with a certainty of those little murmurs of astonishment which are so dear to the soul of the conjurer. Yet these seemingly simple tricks are decidedly difficult. All manner of wickedness and deception has to be learned before one really effective card-trick can be performed. Yet many of them are as amusing to the deceiver as to the deceived. To give your enemy, or, still better, your friend, his free choice of any one card in a pack, with the certainty that he will take the one you intend him to take, leads a man to reflect rosilily upon his own exceeding cleverness; and, after all, a man's vanities are the true salt of life and of conjuring. Mr. Hoffmann gives a very lucid description of Robert Houdin's famous trick (too rarely seen now) of making a pack of cards pass up the sleeve. Well done, nothing could be more brilliant; carelessly and timidly performed, nothing can be tamer and more disappointing. Houdin usually followed this trick with an almost equally brilliant, because an exceedingly difficult, trick—enlarging and diminishing the size of a pack of cards at will. In his case sheer manual dexterity did everything; but so few conjurers can equal that wonderful man's clever manipulation that a graduated series of packs—one pack really smaller than the other—is now commonly used. Upon card-tricks which require special apparatus Mr. Hoffmann is especially instructive. In many of these tricks he has himself made ingenious improvements; and, as he knows all about the secrets of other people, including the mysterious Buatier, he has many things under this head to tell that are worth knowing. Most of the tricks which end in the appearance of a chosen card in a houlette, upon an easel, or in a crystal frame are worked upon the same system, and many of them require the help of an assistant; and it is one of the superiorities of M. Buatier de Kolta over most other conjurers that he manages illusions of that kind without assistance. There is one little secret which we may, perhaps, be permitted to reveal. Few sleights are more surprising to the uninitiated than those in which a ring, a glove, a card, or even a watch, are supposed to be fired from a pistol at a target. The pistol, of the good old piratical pattern, with which the belts of the Miller and his Men used to be stuffed, is ostentatiously loaded with powder and ball, and is fired off to the delicious terror of the audience. But there is nothing to be afraid of. The bullet does not leave the barrel, since the effective barrel from which the charge (of powder only) is really fired is beneath the dummy barrel, and pretends to be no more than an innocent receptacle for the ramrod.

Next to tricks with cards those with coins are perhaps most useful to the amateur—and it is for the behoof of the amateur that Mr. Hoffmann writes. Many of these sleights are quite easy to learn, and are effective out of all proportion to their simplicity. Very simple, and by no means difficult, is the new and vastly improved "Multiplication of Money" trick, invented by Mr. H. B. Lodge. This consists in manipulating a florin until it produces sixty or eighty more florins. Dexterous palming is all that is needed for this clever achievement, which will create quite as much astonishment as the elaborate and wilful smashing of a gold watch by the aid of complicated appliances. This trick is quite as successful as that most excellent of all common conjuring feats—the production of an orange from the coat-collar, or even the nose, of a spectator. Mr. Hoffmann tells a capital story of the simple wonder of an old pauper woman from whose nose he once gathered an orange. At intervals during the evening she thoughtfully rubbed her nose with her apron, as if tempted to try again on her own account. One of the most famous and most pleasing of conjuring tricks is the smashed watch, which amuses everybody except, perhaps, the owner of the watch, who is apt to look uncomfortable during the operation. But that look of discomfort, as Mr. Hoffmann says, only heightens the delight of the others.

To the amateur, whether literary or practical, Mr. Hoffmann's book would be valuable if for no other reason than that it gives authentic explanations of many well-known and very puzzling achievements of legerdemain—such as the "Vanishing Lady," and the writing on the arm, which caused a good deal of wonderment when it was first introduced some years ago by Dr. Lynn. Of apparently minor but exceedingly ingenious and difficult tricks is the "dissolving handkerchiefs." We do not know if this is the invention of M. Buatier, but if it be not it has been so enormously improved by him that it is practically a new feat. The peculiarity in his performance is, that when he literally "does the trick," he has his coat off and his shirt sleeves rolled up. He is thus able triumphantly to declare that the handkerchiefs cannot possibly disappear "up his sleeve." Nor do they. If anybody wants to know where they do go to, let him consult Mr. Hoffmann's book. It is pleasing to learn that there is one conjuring feat, and, we believe, only one, that has never yet been imitated, and that is Mr. Hartz's Inexhaustible Hat. Mr. Hartz is, of course, a man of astonishing genius in matters of legerdemain—

None but himself can be his parallel.

It would not be difficult to divine every one of Mr. Hartz's secrets, but he has brought sleight of hand to such amazing perfection that whoso should endeavour (and many have endeavoured in private) to imitate it would have but his labour for his pains. As well might a tragedian, even of heroic mould, endeavour to imitate Mr. Irving's reading of Hamlet.

It says much for the amiability of conjurers that they should be willing to tell their mysteries, either to Mr. Hoffmann or to the makers of conjuring apparatus. Had they been more secret the world would have lost some exceedingly amusing books, and generations of spectators would have lost a vast amount of enjoyment. For it is a curious fact that the knowledge of "how it's done" heightens the interest with which the learned in legerdemain watch a brilliant performance. If you are a true student, when you know all about it your respect for the performer's dexterity is vastly increased.

ROULETTE.*

THE days are happily gone by when every watering-place on the Continent attracted travellers by the fatal fascination of roulette. The Governments of Western Europe have grown moral, in this respect at all events, and no public gaming-table is within easy reach of tourists, except that at the diminutive Principality of Monaco. Long threatened by public opinion, it yet maintains itself, in spite of the ecclesiastical censures of the Anglican Bishop having jurisdiction over the Mediterranean, who discountenances it to the extent of refusing to appoint a chaplain to the place, holding, apparently, that it is better that ninety-nine sinners should be lost than that one should be saved.

"Professor" J. S. Bond, who, in order to show that he is in close communication with the headquarters of the game, dates from a neighbouring town, has brought out a little manual on the subject of Roulette. He is also very anxious that his address should be known, because he starts by informing his readers that he has given a lifetime's study to the subject, and then volunteers to give advice thereon gratuitously, either by correspondence or personal interview, to any serious players who may wish to consult him. Certainly, if such players wish to extract any information out of the "Professor," in the way of finding a golden road to fortune, they must resort to his kindly offer of personal advice, for they will get little comfort from his book. Perhaps it is intended as a warning, and not as an encouragement to the practice to which he has devoted his own life; if so, all honour to him; but his meaning might have been expressed a little more clearly. Mr. Bond—it is, perhaps, as well to drop the designation of "Professor," in our ignorance of the authority which entitled him to assume it—magniloquently announces his view of modern history. According to him, it is but the history of the gradual encroachment of science on the domain of chance; this granted, it may be conceded to him that it would indeed be a singular thing if so-called games of chance were the only exception to the rule. We are led to infer, therefore, that, in Mr. Bond's opinion, roulette is incorrectly included among games of chance; probably, in fact, his chief intention in coming before the public is to prove as much as this. Perhaps—in view of Mr. Bond's dictum it is safer not to say perchance—he proves a little too much. Some people may be disappointed on opening the manual, and seeing the first paragraph headed "Laws of Roulette," to find that no "Laws," in the sense of rules for playing the game, are given. Mr. Bond, no doubt, takes it for granted that every one is familiar with these. The laws which he undertakes to expound are his exposition of the results of his study of the doctrine of chances; on which he, at any rate, does take on himself to lay down the law with an amount of dogmatism calculated to frighten off any one from venturing to question them. We are told that it is useless for a player to argue on the subject at all until he has thoroughly familiarized himself with these laws, and got them as perfectly in his head as a geometrician has the axioms of Euclid; that, in fact, one might as well criticize the Eiffel Tower without knowing the first principles of mechanics. We are warned that this obvious truism is generally neglected, and that the most ignorant tyro will undertake to give his notion of the laws of roulette, or, worse than all, will unhesitatingly pronounce that it has no laws at all. A careful examination of Mr. Bond's treatise leads rather to the conclusion that, on his showing, this latter is not very far from the truth—namely, that there is very little law about it. According to the definition of the best publicists, a law means a rule obliging to a course of conduct. What course of conduct is the outcome of the principles set forth here? Let us examine his propositions somewhat in detail. Mr. Bond enumerates six different laws. The first he calls the Law of Marches, a marche being the particular way of choosing at each spin the colour or chance on which the player elects to stake. The law is that every marche, in its results—i.e. the proportion of gains and losses—equals every other marche. This law Mr. Bond demonstrates from the fact that no one has ever succeeded in inventing a bad marche, for if any one did discover such a system—i.e. one in which he would lose more bets than he would win—any one else could immediately convert it into a good one by the simple process of reversing it. According to this, it would seem that a player who has convinced himself that his system is a bad one—a conviction at which most players arrive pretty soon—has only got to reverse his system in order to ensure success. But it would be doing Mr. Bond an injustice to assume that he means this. All he means is, that in the long run one system is as good or as bad as another, which may be and probably is true, but certainly is not comforting. It is necessary, in fact, to read in the important qualification, in the long run, into most of Mr. Bond's statements about the chances at roulette, and the run is generally long enough to break any individual player who plays at intervals not sufficiently long for his luck to come round again, while to the bank, which plays steadily on and on, the luck really does come round again, so that, even if it had no chances in its favour, it would still have the advantage as against casual opponents. According to the well-understood law of averages, it is quite true that a given figure, or series of figures, will recur a certain number of times within a given series; the difficulty that upsets any system of play is that the series is so long that it is utterly impossible for any player to reckon on being able to hit off with certainty the period of recurrence; he is broken long before it arrives, and has only the melancholy satisfaction of being able to prove that it is mathematically certain that he must have won back his losses if only he could have held out long enough. Mr. Bond depicts accurately enough the phases of illusion and disillusion through which an unfortunate novice passes in his wild-goose chase after a good "march," only to reach the conclusion after all that one is as good, or as bad, as another.

The next law which Mr. Bond enunciates is what he calls the Law of Constant Play and its converse fallacy of occasional play. The law is this:—That, at whatever table you play, and for whatever periods, long or short, the sum of all of them will amount to exactly the same chances for or against you as if you had played continuously. He points out that you cannot "cheat luck" by going from table to table, or by playing an hour one day and another hour on the next, or at any other intervals. On any one given occasion a player has just the same chance with any conceivable system, or, as we have seen above, with none at all, of having the run for or against him; but a repetition of these occasional attacks brings him into the sphere of continuous play, and renders him subject to its laws. Here, again, the amount of comfort to be extracted from the law is somewhat negative. Mr. Bond next passes on to what he designates the very important Law of Equilibrium—namely, that in the long run there will be absolute equilibrium in the various chances, and in the number of wins and losses, exactly in proportion to the amount of chances for or against them. The fallacy connected with this law is that in any definite number of turns an equilibrium of chances will take place. Mr. Bond admits that, though the law is absolutely true in itself, it is utterly useless for practical purposes, because, before the condition of equilibrium is reached, a deviation of incalculable extent may take place, and that Rothschild himself might be ruined while waiting for the equilibrium. This deviation Mr. Bond terms the Ecart, and he lays down as his fourth law that its extent is always indefinite, that no one can gauge its probable duration. Though, however, the absolute duration of the écart is indefinite, its percentage, according to Mr. Bond, diminishes with the number of balls spun. This statement is apparently in contradiction to the previously established Law of Equilibrium; and, in fact, Mr. Bond, having made it, immediately proceeds to upset it by demonstrating that, in spite thereof, the net result to a player on a sufficiently large average of spins would as nearly as possible be exactly nothing. The fifth law offered for our acceptance, the Law of Series, is in the following terms—that the recurrence of any series, whether of one colour or of any figure or combination of figures, takes place in the inverse ratio of its complication. This is simply another method of stating the obvious truism that, if the chances are two to one against you, they will turn up—in the long run, be it always borne in mind—exactly twice as often as if they were four to one. It was hardly worth while to go into an elaborate series of calculations, illustrated by diagrams and tables, to establish a proposition of so simple a nature as this. The last law which Mr. Bond undertakes to lay down—the Law of Progressions—is somewhat difficult to analyse, because he does not condescend to state it in any definite terms; but it is evident, from his commentary on it, that it amounts to just about as much as several of his other laws—that is, to nothing. To give his own words at the conclusion of an elaborate exposition of play, "The whole amount of what we shall have painfully won by the ballotage will be exactly swallowed up by the écart."

The Law of the Zero scarcely seems worthy, even in Mr. Bond's estimation, of being dignified by such an imposing title; for he does not attempt to formulate it in terms, and yet it is the mainstay of the bank. As played at Monte Carlo, whenever the Zero turns up the bank, apparently, impounds all the money on the table, and plays the next spin simply on the colour, giving back their stakes to those who have spotted it correctly. It does not require much trouble to demonstrate that this is one chance in thirty-seven absolutely against the player; the bank must win from all who have staked on the wrong colour, and loses nothing to those who have staked on the right. This chance is estimated by Mr. Bond at 1·37 per cent. in favour of the bank; well may he say that Zero has built the Casino and is the real Prince of Monaco. In conclusion, Mr. Bond states the problem thus:—No player can hope to win more bets than the bank by any conceivable marche or system, yet each will certainly have to pay the tribute to the Zero, while running the chance of the indefinite écart; is it possible to win against these odds? Mr. Bond hints obscurely that, by new methods in strict adherence to the laws which he has enumerated, success is possible, but he gives no sort of intimation of the nature of the method. Taken as a warning against ever playing roulette, his treatise may possibly be useful; taken as a guide towards the attainment of success in playing the game, it only amounts to what he considers as the principal factor therein—Zero.

A NATURALIST IN NORTH CELEBES.*

OF the five huge islands or small continents which stud the Indian seas between Asia and Australia, the least known, except New Guinea, is perhaps Celebes, which, like a gigantic spider, thrusts its four curious peninsulas north and east and south into the ocean. It is larger than England and Wales, longer than Great Britain, and its coast-line is positively not less than two thousand miles. Of this enormous extent of territory, the centre remains absolutely unexplored and unknown; and, indeed, it is the mere finger-nails on the hands of its immense arms which alone have been described with any minuteness by Europeans. The Dutch are nominally the masters of Celebes; but their sovereignty is limited to a few settlements. As early as 1513, we think, the Portuguese had a factory at Makassar; they abandoned it, and were succeeded by the English about a century later, while in 1667 the Dutch succeeded in violently exiling our countrymen under circumstances not dissimilar to those the record of which has survived in literature in the Amboyna of Dryden. According to Mr. Hickson, the author of the fascinating volume before us, the Dutch sway appears to have steadily dwindled. In an account of Dutch Celebes which now lies before us, drawn up some sixty years ago, the settlements of Europeans are much more numerous than Mr. Hickson describes, and Fort Rotterdam, which was then the seat of government, is not so much as mentioned by this latest traveller in Celebes. The present capital is Makassar, a fine town built on either side of a magnificent avenue of tamarind trees in the extreme south-west of the island.

Mr. Hickson's zoological labours, however, were mainly conducted at the opposite, or north-easterly, extremity of the country. Taking a steamer from Makassar, he crossed the Equator, and arrived in three days at Manado, the capital of the northern colony, where a visit from an educated Englishman was hailed as an event as welcome as it was extraordinary. It was Mr. Hickson's purpose to make Manado the centre of his operations, but he had scarcely arrived when he discovered that, by a signal piece of good fortune, a British man-of-war had just reached Banka Straits, the northern frontier of Celebes, for surveying purposes, and that he would be cordially welcomed on board of her. "The chances," he says, "that were thus open to me of choosing a suitable locality for my work, and investigating a large extent of coral reef, before I finally settled down, were such as any naturalist in those regions might dream of for years without realizing"; and consequently he took an opportunity which immediately offered of joining the Flying Fish at Banka.

He was soon in the ecstasy of bumping, for the first time, on the jewelled coral-reef of a tropical shore. The Banka Straits is a small sea almost entirely enclosed between Celebes on the south and the lesser islands of Talisse and Ganga on the west and Banka on the east. Wholly unknown to English travellers, these islands are under the sway of Holland; and at Koa, in Talisse, there is a tiny Dutch settlement, with a resident overseer. This Banka Sea is particularly favourable for the work of a naturalist, since its waters are commonly of a glassy stillness, and its coasts present every variety of tropical shore—coral reefs, steep rocks, and river sand. As the guest of the officers of the Flying Fish, Mr. Hickson visited all parts of this inland sea, and passed outside it round the corner of Celebes, and even to several of the little-known chain of islands stretching northwards to the Philippines. In the course of this voyage he had the unusual good fortune to be able to explore and ascend the curious oceanic volcano of Ruang. The result of all these explorations, however, was to persuade him that for his peculiar purpose as a zoologist no spot offered so many advantages as Talisse. He therefore parted from his hospitable friends, and proceeded to make the village of Koa his headquarters.

His daily life at Talisse is sketched by Mr. Hickson in graphic, and yet modest, language. He made some discoveries which, we fancy, are not generally known to naturalists. For instance, he was at first greatly disappointed to find that in these tropical waters his surface-net at first almost always came up empty. At last it struck him that, perhaps, he did not come out early enough; and so, in fact, it was; for in the early morning hours every sweep of his net brought up countless pelagic forms of all sorts and sizes. This was probably due to the coolness of the surface at that time of day. Of his experiences, however, the most disappointing seems to have been his attempt at orchid-hunting. It appears that to collect orchid-bulbs in the neighbourhood of the swamps is a remarkably trying employment. The moment you try to pull the orchid away from the tree on which it grows, legions of fierce red ants, of alarming size, turn round upon you, and proceed to run up your arms, down your neck, up inside your trousers, and everywhere else where flesh can be found, and nip you to the verge of madness. Mr. Hickson, however, does not seem to be easily daunted; he made a large collection of bulbs, and then, during a serious illness, they all went bad. Such is life!

A subject to which our naturalist gave a good deal of useful observation was the action of direct exposure to the flood-tide from the open ocean upon coral growth. He thinks that it is owing to the scouring action of the tide settling on the eastern shores of Celebes and the neighbouring islets that the coral does not seem to flourish there. The only two conspicuous mammals which Mr. Hickson observed on Talisse were the tailless black baboon (Cynopithecus nigrescens) and that odd nocturnal prowler, the Cuscus celebensis; the strange fact being that, of these two forms, one is characteristic of the African fauna and the other of the widely distinct region of Australia. The babirusa, the curious pig of Celebes, common on the mainland close by, is not found wild any longer on Talisse itself. The mangrove swamp proved to be a field of striking interest from a biological point of view. There is some reason to believe that corals feed on vegetable substances, and that their subsistence is to some extent supplied by débris from trees in the mangrove swamps. If this is indeed the case, it is easy to see why the coral-banks in the neighbourhood of these latter are commonly so much more healthy than those which line steeper and barer shores. It also seems probable that the water which drains the mangrove swamps carries down with it a great quantity of carbonic acid in solution, and that this directly stimulates the formation of lime, and, therefore, of the skeleton-walls of growing coral.

After some months spent at Talisse, Mr. Hickson seized an opportunity of visiting the curious and little-known archipelago, or series of archipelagos, lying in the Indian Sea, north of Celebes. The Resident of Manado had to make an official tour through such islands as lie under the protectorate of Holland, and Mr. Hickson was invited, with extreme cordiality, to accompany the party. He was accordingly able to visit places which, it is very probable, no educated Englishman, and very few Europeans of any nationality, had previously seen. The most remote point reached by the expedition was the Nanusa group, inhabited by a cowed and phlegmatic race of Malays, in whose principal village Mr. Hickson was fortunate enough to succeed in purchasing "god-cages" and fetish praus of highly primitive workmanship. A more important archipelago, lying isolated in the northern offing of the Straits of Molucca, is the Talaut Islands, the principal village of which is Pulutan, where a boat was sent ashore to fetch the Rajah:—

The Rajah of Pulutan and his people were miserable-looking, half-starved individuals, and were all bent half double with awe or fright as they approached the Resident. They seemed to be more comfortable when they were squatting in a row on the deck, and supporting one another shoulder to shoulder, like a group of monkeys. The Rajah's hair was long, black, and rather crimped, and his head was covered with a dirty cloth fashioned like a turban, which he removed when he came on board. He was clothed in a loose-hanging garment of native manufacture; and, judging from his appearance, must have had very little contact at any time with Europeans or European manufactures.

In most of these islands the Resident was met by terrible stories of sickness and death from dysentery. The atmosphere was pestilential, and it appeared that the elements of hygienic care had everywhere been neglected. According to Mr. Hickson, the decrease of this harmless population is mainly due to its persistent laziness and dirtiness. At Béo, in Talaut, three thousand people had died, out of a population of nine thousand, yet it seemed less the climate which was at fault than the absence of all sanitary care. From Talaut they steamed westward to Great Sangir, and passed under the crest of the most formidable of all the fire-spouting mountains of the Moluccas, the awful Awu volcano. One of the most valuable of Mr. Hickson's chapters deals with the characteristics of the Sangir Islands.

The naturalist's return to his station on Talisse was, unhappily, soon followed by a tedious illness. He does not say so; but we may conjecture that the germs of this disease were caught in the fever-stricken villages of Talaut. At all events, it proved so severe that he was obliged to give up his work and return to Manado, on the mainland of Celebes, where he resided, in a fine wholesome air, from January until September 1886, when he returned to England. He occupied the greater part of these months in studying the natural history, language, mythology, and folklore of Minahassa, the Dutch colony which occupies the extremity of the northern peninsula of Celebes, and of which the capital is Manado. In April he visited the interior of the province, passing through mountain scenery of great beauty, and reaching, high up in the brilliant air, the ancient city of Tondano, which lies, among its gardens of flowers, on the shores of a large and romantic lake. The remainder of Mr. Hickson's volume is mainly occupied with chapters on the mythology, the customs, and the romances of the Minahassers, and of various miscellaneous points connected with the history of Northern Celebes. The style of the author is simple and unaffected. He is exceedingly modest with regard to his own exploits, and his occasional frank confessions of failure or of imperfect knowledge give the reader great confidence in the truth of his substantial statements. He has considerably increased our acquaintance with a little-visited portion of the globe. His book is adorned by two good maps, several illustrations, and a remarkably full bibliography of works—the great majority of them in the Dutch language—dealing with Celebes and its products.

THE larger and more interesting portion of Lord Rosslyn's new book of poems is occupied entirely by the sonnet, a metrical form familiar to the author, and one in which he has repeatedly sought and achieved distinction. The present volume, * Sonnets and Poems. By the Earl of Rosslyn. Dedicated to the Queen. London: Remington & Co. 1889.

by its wider range and fuller representation of the poet's gifts and craftsmanship, will strengthen the favourable impression created by his earlier and slighter publication. Lord Rosslyn's sonnets comprise many specimens that are certain to please the sensitive ear and the critical faculty of purists. That they do not invariably run with the little theories of pedants, who treat the "scanty plot" like a surveyor with a five-foot rule and decry the sinful luxury of free rhyming, is a matter that leaves us entirely undisturbed. Grace and simplicity, a happy facility of expression, and verse that has a dulcet flow, distinguish the greater number of Lord Rosslyn's sonnets. They are in Italian form and in English; and, whether orthodox or free, they are, with few exceptions, true sonnets and individual poems, never sonnet-stanzas, though a continuity of mood or emotion is naturally and gracefully maintained through a sequence of the poems. So much has been written of late on the structure of the sonnet in the merely sterile way of pedantry that there was, and is still, a real danger that the sonnet would be degraded to a mechanical toy in the hands of formalists. Indeed, it has fared no better in the exercise-books of not a few minor singers. From this or any other species of artifice Lord Rosslyn's poetry is absolutely free. Whether it is the sonnets of personal or social inspiration, or those of meditation, or the memorial sonnets, or the sonnets of places—and in these two latter sections we find the best of the poet's work—the poetic impulse possesses the poetic form as a guiding, controlling, inspiring force. Sweetness and fluency, clearness of vision, a happy simplicity of diction, characterize the sonnets. The poet himself is not more just when he confesses his sympathy with calm, clear utterance of poetic truth and his distrust of "clamorous sublimities" and distempered rhapsody:—

The Muse I love belongs to every age;
And, true herself, writes truth, and truth alone;
Nature and truth live pictured on her page;
Without the one the others were undone.

The confession of this modest faith is amply sustained by the charming "Tyrolean Sonnets," a melodious series of descriptive and contemplative poems which will afford pleasure to all lovers of the sonnet. A pretty fancy is quaintly treated in the following samples from the "Sonnets of Meditation" on neglected old prints in a portfolio:—

They lie within this purgatorial book.
In patient waiting for the Day of Doom,
As lost, as labours of the Tyrian loom,
This courtly smile or that imperious look!
Here simpers Phyllis with a flowery crook,
And there frowns one who sought the cannon's boom,
And courted peril, as a mistress whom
He madly worshipped, and by yonder brook
A loving pair stand gazing into space—
They whisper fondly of their future home,
Though dead a hundred years! A cruel fate
Is theirs indeed, each packed within this case—
Unhappy prisoners in a dusty tome
That closes o'er them like the Inferno's Gate!

Some of Lord Rosslyn's most notable sonnets will be found among those commemorative of distinguished personages; and these, like the various sets of sonnets in the book, are marked by the eloquence of sincerity and simplicity. Lord Rosslyn evidently loves not that windy yet imposing sonority of phrase which is the staple of most post-Rossettian sonnets. He is not afraid of being monosyllabic through a whole verse, nor of plain rhymes in an Italian form; and his sonnets seldom hang at the rhyming, as in the modern manner. To give one more example, here is one of the "Tyrolean Sonnets"; its title "The Priest at Gastein":—

If pleasure were the aim and end of all,
And Life, so called, to be the final bound
Of my existence; then this thrilling sound—
Tumultuous music of the waterfall
At play for ever with the rocks—might call
My days to poesy, and this spangled ground,
Where nature's fairest offerings abound,
Might be my couch and they at last my pall.
But the proud prodigal Earth is not my home,
Nor the dark forest my abiding place;
These passing blooms but captivate the eye.
The closer sanctuary needs me, and I come
To guide a wayward and rebellious race
To Him who bore His Cross to Calvary.

The "Translations" and "Stanzas for Music," with which Lord Rosslyn's book concludes, include some admirable renderings from Béranger, Musset, Lamartine, and Murger; while in the lyrical section that follows there are several songs that cannot but appeal to composers of music, and may, we trust, in their hands, find sympathetic setting. It is time that the general dreariness of latter-day "song-words" should be redeemed.

CHRISTMAS BOOKS.

VII.

WRITERS who follow the method of M. Jules Verne lag far behind that lively and ingenious inventor. Mr. André, indeed, is an exception; but Mr. André is no imitator, and his Conquest of the Moon is altogether an exceptional book, whereas we have nothing but a careful imitation of M. Jules Verne in Babylon Electrified (Chapman & Hall), a translation from the French by Frank Linstow White, with illustrations by Montader. The story tells of the exploitation of Mesopotamia by a wealthy Englishman and French and English engineers, whose aim is to restore prosperity to Babylon by electricity. The party comprises Sir John Badger, Baronet, always spoken of as "Lord Badger," his daughter, "Miss Nelly," a good study of the "English Miss," a pressman, a German archaeologist picked up en route to Babylon, and two engineers, who become enamoured of the lively Miss Nelly and desperate rivals. The French origin and the American printing of the book are tolerably apparent, apart from the title-page. "Traveler," of course, we have, and in one place we read "two liters of hydrogen for one liter of oxygen." The adjective "vulgar," applied to a magpie, instead of the English equivalent "common," is another freak of translation. The story has but a languid movement until the final catastrophe is approached, and is, on the whole, heavy reading for romantic spirits. The scheme of the electricians is, however, cleverly devised. It involves the utilization of solar heat by means of the identical apparatus described and depicted in the Conquest of the Moon, and embraces lighting, heating, irrigation, and other means of restoring a ruined kingdom. The drawings by Montader are as good as French book illustration is wont to be. Mr. Kirk Munroe's Golden Days of '49 (W. H. Allen & Co.) is a sample from American literature for boys, and may be prescribed as an excellent alternative to sufferers from a surfeit of sea stories. It is a vivacious narrative of the fortunes of two adventurers in the early days of Californian gold-fields. The author shows an intimate knowledge of the country and the desperate society of the diggings. One of his heroes is a diverting character. His whole vocabulary is compacted of the slang of the gaming-saloons and miners' lingo. When his companion rescues him from a dilemma that looks like a ne plus ultra, his enthusiasm is striking:—"Pard, you're the bulliest kind of a trump that ever was led for a man to follow! You're a circus with three rings! Do we hold over Bowers? You may bet your sweet life we do! Have we got him where the wool's all wore off the top of his head? Oh, little old Lizzy Jane and all the girls! Never mind me, pard. I'm a brass band, and I've got to toot. Hooray for Andy Jackson!" Bowers is a sneaking villain who has possessed himself of a certain map which is the key to a mysterious Val d'Oro they had intended to prospect. Here they find nuggets as plentiful as plums in a Christmas pudding, so plentiful that the Californian is troubled by the abundance, finding it "harder to play a hand that's all face cards and trumps, according to Hoyle, than one that don't show a colour in the pan"—a pretty confusion of metaphors. "Thirsty Thurston," as he is called, is always entertaining, and never at a loss at the pinch of peril. Referring to the scores of abandoned towns and settlements in California, and the common reproach of foreigners that there are no ruins in America, he exclaims:—"Ruins! Well, now, if this here little old State of California can't beat the shell for ruins, same as she does for everything else that can be mentioned, then I'm a galoot! Why, stranger, in the amount and variety and generally ornery aspect of our ruins, we can easy lay over the world, and not half try." But Mr. Munroe's story must be read. It is thoroughly enjoyable from first to last. The Hermit Hunter of the Wilds (Blackie & Sons), by Dr. Gordon Stables, is the story of a boy who loved to dream of combining the incompatible pursuits of hunter and anchorite. Growing up, he starts off on a mission to find a lost friend in the wilds of Ecuador, and has the best of luck in adventures and the happy result of his enterprise. As in Mr. Hutcheson's Black Man's Ghost, the story introduces us to the Galapagos Islands and a buccaneer's treasure. For sheer fortuitous meetings Dr. Stables's story beats the record. Never did writer so defy the doctrine of cool calculators.

Independence of another kind is shown by Dr. Stables in Exiles of Fortune, one of a goodly collection of wholesome and interesting gift-books for the young issued by Messrs. J. F. Shaw & Co. In this story we are interested at the opening in the unhappy severance, through a misunderstanding, of two young men, one of whom flies the country, thinking he has caused the death of his friend. He joins a party voyaging to Alaska and Arctic seas; and of these two youths we hear little or nothing till the very last chapter. The voyage and its incidents are full of interest; yet we resent somewhat plunging into what is virtually a new story. From Messrs. Shaw & Co.'s list we select Mrs. Marshall's admirable, lifelike, and artistic tale, The End Crowns All; Miss Emily Holt's historical romances, Behind the Veil and It Might Have Been, the last an eminently successful example of the writer's careful, yet picturesque, treatment of historical material; and Mrs. Shaw's sound and interesting moral story, Lilian's Hope, with its effective illustration of conflicting love and duty. By Jennie Chappell we have a pretty story for children, Little Radiance, and Berne's Bargain, fully as pleasing, and enforcing lessons for young boys, never wholly needless. The difficulty of blending religious instruction with fiction is attacked with varying success in Little Ruth's Lady, by E. Everett-Green; Miss Mollie and her Boys, by L. Marston; Mrs. Marshall's Robert's Race, and Miss Stebbings's "Never and For Ever," and in the last two the didactic purpose is skilfully subordinated to what should be the first aim of the story-teller. In Shaw's Popular Stories are contributions by Mrs. Meade, Brenda, Emily S. Holt, and other practised hands, and excellent cheap fiction is supplied by "Shaw's Home Series," in which we note new editions of Gipsy

Rock, Joyce Tregarthen, &c., and by "Shaw's Penny Series," which includes The Expected Guest, by S. W. Oswald, a capital little story, and The Boy Martyr, a much less edifying tale. Finally, to close our survey of Messrs. Shaw's books with a bonne bouche, we have a pleasant story about children in Emily Brodie's Old Christie's Cabin.

At the head of Messrs. Nelson & Sons' books must be placed a new illustrated edition of The Chronicles of the Schönberg-Cotta Family, with tasteful binding, good woodcuts, red-edged paper, and good type. Altogether a popular book in comely guise. The heroine of the Rev. E. A. Rand's Margie at the Harbour Light is the pious daughter of a lighthouse-keeper; she is well charged with religious convictions, and courageously improves every occasion for their strengthening. The experienced lady who writes under the mystical letters A.L.O.E. carries us far afield in Beyond the Black Waters, a story of the blameless Karens of Burmah, concerning whom the author offers an interesting account derived from sound sources. The sensational element in the book is a little too obtrusive, and the story is not skilfully told. Follow the Right, by G. E. Wyatt, is a story in praise of the inflexible discharge of duty—a good story altogether, with an absurd illustration by way of frontispiece, which is intended to depict a schoolboy pluckily saving a spaniel from an approaching train, but reveals a deliberate boy placing the unfortunate beast in the way of the engine for instant execution. The converse of this graphic art is shown in the delightful picture of a boy riding an ostrich in Eleanor Stredder's bright and brisk story of a boy's life in South Africa, Jack and his Ostrich. The Pilgrim's Progress is read originally, everybody must admit, for the story's sake, and the allegory is left for mature cogitation. Going on Pilgrimage, by Lucy Taylor, appears to be designed to rectify this ancient usage. It supplies a commentary to the book and explains Bunyan's allegory. The thing is done with judgment; but was it worth doing? We protest we cannot think it necessary, though harmless it may well be.

Mrs. Maclehose's treatment of the Faerie Queene belongs to another category of work. Her Tales from Spenser (Glasgow: Maclehose & Sons) is a delightful book for children. The allegory is properly ignored, comment there is none, and the writer narrates the fascinating legends of Una, Florimel, Pastorella, and so forth, with admirable fidelity and sympathy, in a style that is both simple and elegant. The book could not have been better executed had it been the work of the Lambs. Mrs. Molesworth's stories are deservedly favourites with parents as well as with children. The Rectory Children, with drawings by Walter Crane (Macmillan & Co.), is a very interesting example, the heroine of which is an odd, cross, uncomfortable little girl, ever in scrapes and ever engaging for all her wilful ways. Her triumphant evolution upwards in conduct and temper is depicted with admirable art. Mr. Alfred Fryer's Travels in Dreamland (Swan Sonnenschein) is a fairy tale endowed with a fair proportion of old-fashioned glamour and fancy. The hero of Mr. John Bickerdyke's pretty fairy-legend, An Irish Midsummer Night's Dream (Sampson Low & Co.), is an angler on an Irish lake, depicted with an angler's enthusiasm for the craft. The fairy scenes are delicately presented, and Mr. Morant Cox's graceful illustrations are very sympathetic with the author's charming phantasy. Stories for girls reveal little variety of scope, though some are less like the ordinary girl's book of the season than a full-fledged novel. For Honour's Sake, by Jennie Chappell (Partridge), has this larger projection. It is fairly interesting, smoothly written, with some power of character-sketching, and far too prolix in narration. Another story needlessly prolonged is Mr. Orde's Grandchildren, by Cecilia S. Lowndes (Nisbet & Co.), a family story, the domestic interest of which is scarcely sufficient to sustain the reader to the end. One Little Vein of Dross (Nisbet & Co.)—an odd title, by the way—is a story told by a young lady who married a rich man and discovered one little vein of dross in his character, which proved to be, after all, no very serious matter. It is a wholesome and placid recital. Mrs. W. S. Burton's Annabel (Griffith, Farran, & Co.), an excellent story for young girls, is healthy in tone and full of stirring sentiment, without a touch of sentimentality.

Among novelties for children we have a "movable toy book," designed by Lothar Meggendorfer, Curious Creatures (Grevel & Co.), with ingenious pictures of animals, birds, and insects, which by a simple mechanical contrivance become exceedingly gay and active. Even the snail on a vine-leaf pops out of his shell on pulling a card tab, while the astonishing weasel in the long grass plays at hide-and-seek with three sly rabbits. This is a very diverting book for the nursery. Laugh and Learn, by Jennett Humphreys (Blackie & Son), offers the little ones the shortest and pleasantest road to the mastery of home-lessons of every description. If ever learning was reconciled to play, it is in this ingenious and useful volume. Children's Stories in English Literature, by Henrietta Christian Wright (Ward & Downey), comprises sketches of historical characters, poets, kings, statesmen, heroes, not in all respects so simple in style as children require. The paraphrases of Spenser and Chaucer are simple even to baldness; but there is not a little in the book that will make young listeners or readers ready inquirers. Perhaps this result is part of the author's intent. Miss Alice Weber's Some Other People is a pretty story, with pretty illustrations, of the pleasant means devised by certain kind folk to make the recovery of some sick children pleasant and profitable. Most children will be pleased with the "fragile fancies" that form the staple of Soap Bubbles (Smith & Innes), a collection of dainty stories and sketches of fairies, and the like, with drawings by T. Pym.

Two young people of wonderful gifts, a boy and a girl, figure in Mr. Frank Stockton's What Might Have Been (Allen & Co.) They are miracles of self-control, resource, enterprise, and "grit." Among other deeds hitherto appropriated by adults, they float a telegraph company, and appear to carry their project to actual working successfully. We are compelled to speak with bated confidence, because some twenty pages, at the critical point of the story, are missing from our copy of the book. The Christmas Annuals this year make the usual display of chromos and supplementary plates. The Graphic offers the bravest pictorial show in colour with Mr. Hugh Thomson's humorous "Two Jolly Postboys"; Mr. Frank Dadd's "Snowed up at Christmas," "Uncle Bill's Pie" by "Mars," and so forth. The "preliminary number" of the Daily Graphic issued with the Christmas number will stimulate curiosity with regard to the new venture, which can scarcely contrive to be as retrospective and antiquarian as the specimen before us. The Illustrated London News is an attractive number, with capital illustrations by F. Barnard, Caton Woodville, F. Hœcker, G. A. Storey, A.R.A., and others. Messrs. Christie Murray and H. Holman's "Sweetbriar in London" occupies the place of honour in the letterpress. Yule Tide (Cassell & Co.) has more variety of entertainment than either of its elder rivals. The chromo, after Mr. G. W. Joy's "Wellington at Angers," is uncommonly good; and the remaining designs, by Mr. Barnard, Miss Alice Havers, Mr. Dadd, and others, are above the average execution of Christmas numbers. Punch's Christmas Number is Punch's Almanack, it seems, with a new face and the old contributors with pen and pencil. There is a retrospect of the year, with a panorama of wondrous comprehensiveness by Mr. Harry Furniss, a "Carnival of Nations," by Mr. Tenniel, and an entirely delightful "Haggard Annual." We have also received the World Christmas number, "Quinnion's Quest," with sketch-pictures of social gatherings by Mr. Bryan; the Belgravia Annual, with stories by "John Strange Winter," Curtius Yorke, Florence Marryat, and others; and Diprose's Annual, illustrated, with short stories and verse by Mrs. Sale Lloyd, John Lathey, jun., Howard Paul, and other writers.

CHRISTMAS CARDS AND DIARIES.

MESSRS. MARCUS WARD & CO. have again sent us many pretty booklets and cards. Amongst the former, one illustrating Mr. Baring-Gould's well-known Evening Hymn for children and the Benedictus and Venite, separately illuminated, are specially to be noticed. "My Lady's Garden," a Calendar for 1890, in form of a small book giving instructions in gardening for every month, is not only useful, but ornamental. C. S. Calverley's "A B C Ball-room Comedy" is very well illustrated by May Oulton. "Showers of Blessings" is a pocket-booklet, but a very pretty one, with a text on one side of each of its pages and a flower on the other. Amongst the Christmas cards, perhaps a series of three cards (257) representing three frogs sleighing is the most original. Then there are "The Kitten and the Toys" (050), three mice and their several adventures (274), four cards depicting severally a butterfly, bee, wasp, and spider (165), that are all delightful. Amongst the landscape cards, Nos. 390 and 991 are, perhaps, the best. The Straw-hats (421), "Toppers" (423a), and Walnuts (353) will please many. Amongst the folding cards, one disclosing a landscape with a spray of flowers on each side (1264) is particularly pretty. Besides those we have already mentioned amongst the collection of little books and cards from Messrs. S. Hildesheimer & Co., "Echoes from Song Land," a selection of poems by various authors, very well illustrated by W. B. Marnock; "Melted in Snow," another collection of poems, illustrated; "Christmas Bells," illustrated by A. T. Leydon; "Cathedral Chimes," illustrated by F. P. Barraud, are all worthy of notice; whilst "Here's Fun! Scraps from the Old Screen," by E. F. Manning, is really original. "Silver Pathways" is a set of twelve Scripture texts, which, with their pretty landscapes, would be a delightful addition to any sick-room. The prettiest of the cards are (1019) little children looking out of window, and surrounded by robins; a bell folding card (1018); a group of swallows (1054); and a quantity of cards with different iridescent designs, amongst the best of which are (1069) a white rose-spray and butterfly, beautifully executed; a set of two cards, one with some marguerites, another with forget-me-nots (1064); a butterfly and grass (1071); a spider's web (1048); a small bunch of wild-flowers and grass (1065); a cross decorated with grass (954).

From Messrs. Prang & Co., Boston, we have received Notes from Mendelssohn, which contains on each page some bars of Mendelssohn's music, some verses, and an illustration by Louis K. Harlow, and some Christmas cards with good designs, amongst which a little child asleep surrounded with pictures of her dreams. A card with a complete wooden doll on one side, and a broken arm and leg on the other, is very quaint.

Messrs. Thos. De la Rue & Co. have sent us a charming collection of diaries; those enclosed in russet-leather purses are particularly attractive. One in an embossed leather case (2240, size B) is pretty, whilst a very small one in a leather case will be the most useful for carrying about, as it takes up no room. Another useful form of a pocket diary is the condensed one enclosed in a narrow leather case. Then there are calendars in all sizes, which, in their bright leather frames, are always a nice addition to a writing-table. Messrs. John Walker & Co. have sent us very good specimens of their diaries, bound in leather, with pencils at the back; No. 2 is a very good size for the pocket; No. 4 is far larger, but has the merit of having pockets, which make it useful as a letter-case.

From Messrs. W. Collins, Sons, & Co. we have received diaries of different sizes, bound in leather. The Portable Diary, "showing a week at an opening"; the Handy Diary, "showing one page for each day"; the Gentleman's Diary, with the pencil attached, and the Pocket Diary. The Scribbling Diary, interleaved with blotting-paper, is a particularly nice one.

Letts's diaries, published by Cassell & Co., are of all sorts and sizes. Amongst them the Office Diary and Almanac (9) is the most perfect, though naturally the most bulky, containing, as it does, a concise Whitaker. No. 27 will be found a very convenient pocket diary. From Messrs. Griffith, Farran, Okeden, & Welsh we have received some hanging calendars—"A Dial of Daies" and "The Book-post Calendar" being both quaint and original; Blackwood's Scribbling Diary, containing an almanac on the cover, and Pettitt's Octavo Diary, both interleaved with blotting-paper, are to be recommended.

Some more very comely diaries reach us from Messrs. Marcus Ward. The four-part division system of this firm has been well approved by practice, and their outer clothing of the books is highly satisfactory. A crocodile-leather card-case form, a small reporter's note-book shape, and a moderate-sized pocket-book purse, with diary inside, may all be commended in their different ways as specimens of good and elegant work.

FRENCH LITERATURE.

ALTHOUGH to a good taste few more attractive étrennes could present themselves or be presented than M. Jouaust's long-promised re-issue, in the severe elegance of his Bibliothèque Artistique, of Musset's Dramatic Works (1), we cannot resist mentioning it under the head of Literature, which it is, first of all, rather than under that of Christmas Books. For the accompaniments M. Jouaust has got M. Jules Lemaitre to supply the introduction, M. Delort to design, and M. Boilvin to etch the illustrations. These latter consist of a portrait (very good) and a frontispiece to each drama. The plate allotted to La nuit vénitienne seems to us the best, that to Fantasio the least good. If the Princess was like that, we do not greatly envy Fantasio, and we do not see how he himself (however he might have obeyed her in trying contrefaire sa taille) could have made his head, and especially his face, several sizes too large for his body. The design is gracefully conceived, however; and so are they all. M. Jules Lemaitre was not likely to go wrong on such a theme. C'est quelque chose qui est à part, says he (as all the good critics have said, while all the bad ones wonder what we mean), and he works this out very well by showing how the most ingenious person who had not read Musset could not deduce him à priori from other [French] dramatists. We bracket [French] because M. Lemaitre, with his usual ill luck in speaking of Shakspeare—usual, but not extraordinary, seeing that he knows no English—includes Shakspeare in the list. Now, as it happens, Shakspeare is the one and only dramatic author in whom germs of Musset are perceptible. Take As You Like It, Twelfth Night, the best parts of Love's Labour's Lost, and part of A Midsummer Night's Dream, and, given also the characteristics of the nineteenth as distinguished from the seventeenth century, you may dimly evolve the conception of something like Fantasio and Les caprices de Marianne. Again, says M. Lemaitre, "Vous ne trouverez pas l'ombre de romanesque dans On ne badine pas avec l'amour." Really? Nothing could show better the difference of the point of view. But we are not now desirous of breaking lances with M. Lemaitre. Musset is one of the very rare authors whom, like certain (also very rare) persons of the other sex, lovers may agree to love in different ways, and for different excellences, and almost without mutual jealousy. And the last sentence of the essay (in which M. Lemaitre principally applies himself to represent Musset as poète de l'amour) is so good that, though it may seem familiar, we must quote an ancient author, and say, "Brayvo, Jools!" "Le poète, nous déroulant le drame de l'amour, nous montre surtout notre grande misère, et il n'y sait point de remède, car il n'y en a pas; mais la façon dont il l'exprime nous donne à un degré rare cette impression de beauté pour la production de laquelle il est possible que le monde ait été uniquement créé." That is not only excellent writing—M. Lemaitre's writing always is—it is criticism. The pieces which the volume contains are La nuit vénitienne, André del Sarto, Les caprices de Marianne, and Fantasio.

It is good that M. Charpentier should have added Hugo to the authors included in his well-known pocket-editions. Hitherto there has been no pocket-edition of any of the poet's work except

(1) Théâtre d'Alfred de Musset. Tome I. Paris: Librairie des Bibliophiles.

(2) Œuvres poétiques de Victor Hugo—Les orientales; Les feuilles d'automne. Paris: Charpentier.

(the publisher's notice forgets this, but we are not sure that it was not contraband) the little "Genève et New York" edition, 1853, of the Châtiments. It is to be hoped that the present issue will be followed up by others.

So much was gossiped in the newspapers about the drama in which M. Daudet followed up L'immortel (3) with a sketch of Strugforlisme (we are not sure that this form has actually been reached, but it is a correct deduction from Strugforliffeur), that nothing need be said about its subject now. There are strong situations in it, but it is still much more of a novel than of a play; though the conclusion is dramatic, at least melodramatic, enough in all conscience. For the figure of Paul Astier is not simple or universal enough for a dramatic centre; it has exactly the fault of the excellent Dr. Ibsen's heroes and heroines, that it is only a thing of "mode," and mode, though admirable in comedy, is not fit for serious drama. Maria Antonia, on the other hand, is tragic enough, but hers is tragedy which wants alexandrines and the grand manner. The best compliment we can pay M. Daudet is to say that we should like to have seen Musset's idea (in verse of course) of the scene where the Duchess discovers, pardons, and separates from her husband and would-be murderer. But M. Daudet's moyens are not quite up to this. There is a preface apologetic of L'immortel; but M. Daudet mistakes the reason of the disgust which that book excited. It was not the attack on the Academy, but the kind of attack, which sickened readers.

M. Jouaust's Nouvelle Héloïse (4) goes on steadily, and has already far distanced any other edition of the book, in grace, portability, and distinction. We have before now said what we have to say of it, and can only repeat it or refer to it. But this third part contains in a note what we have always thought one of the classical places of Jean-Jacques. "Jamais," says he in a note, "son [La Rochefoucauld's] triste livre ne sera goûté des bonnes gens." To which it may be observed that those who cannot "taste" both La Rochefoucauld and Jean-Jacques go but clopin-clopant in literature.

M. Bocher (5) is one of those numerous good persons who make one doubt whether to laugh or cry. He thinks that the nineteenth century "aura à enregistrer le développement le plus extraordinaire qui se soit jamais accompli dans l'œuvre naturelle de l'humanité." So have we heard of a youthful weasel, who, he also by himself he, was persuaded that he had hit upon the development the most extraordinary of the natural work of viverrinity. But the thoughts of his grandmother were different.

NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

THE Life of William Ellis, by Edmund Kell Blyth (Kegan Paul, Trench, & Co.), sets forth the career of an ardent educational reformer, whose labours in the cause of popular education date from the very commencement of the movement, and resulted in the foundation of the first of the Birkbeck schools in 1848, soon after the death of the excellent Dr. Birkbeck, who established the Mechanics' Institutions once so prevalent in London and other towns. Years before this date, however, William Ellis was actively engaged as a writer and a lecturer in advocating the elevation of the masses by education. He was one of the pioneers of popular education, and a relentless worker both as a theorist and a teacher, pushing his views on social economy with extraordinary pertinacity, regardless of all snubs and rebuffs, even in quarters that less sanguine men might have deemed inaccessible. He had early in life framed his system, and upheld it with fervour. It was an age of systems, of lecturing, of schemes for raising the people by the spread of knowledge, and wonderful were many of the means by which it was sought to spread knowledge. Not all the systems possessed the vitality of those of Bell and Lancaster, or Pestalozzi, or Froebel; some enjoyed an extremely little day, and died unlamented. But William Ellis, despite his business as underwriter to a large insurance Company, continued to get through an immense amount of work in carrying out his philanthropic plans. He was associated with the Utilitarian men, his social economy being based to some extent on the writings of Bentham and James Mill; he spread knowledge, in conjunction with Brougham, when the "Useful Knowledge Society" of the "learned friend" was newly instituted; he contributed to the Westminster Review from the first, and, subsequent to the establishment of many Birkbeck schools, published a variety of pamphlets and books on education and political economy. Of his writings, the best known, and that which best illustrates his method, is Philo-Socrates, which appeared five-and-twenty years since. He wrote much on political, or social, economy, as he preferred it, sometimes in the form of a treatise, and occasionally in the popular illustrative style adopted by Harriet Martineau, of which his Education as a Means of Preventing Destitution is a good example. The very title is only too expressive of the sanguine hopes of a past generation of reformers. Almost to the close of his busy life Ellis ceased not to write. With the advent of national education and the Board schools his ready pen found material for letters and pamphlets. There was ever some crisis at hand to be discussed, some Pressing Want of Our Time to be urged, as the schoolmaster abroad became more than ever abroad under the new order, and the new cry for the "improved schoolmaster" was heard in the land. That cry is still raised in the wilderness, "educationists" are still among us imagining many vain things if not furiously raging, and Mr. Blyth's book may usefully remind these reformers what a fleeting show is all the literature on the subject, and how little permanent are the best of all possible systems.

The latest addition to the elegant "Knickerbocker Nuggets" Series comprises two volumes of American war songs, edited by Mr. George Cary Eggleston—American War Ballads and Lyrics (Putnam's Sons)—a collection that represents the patriotic poetry of the colonial wars, the revolution, the naval actions of 1812, the Mexican war, and the great Civil War. The editor's aim has been to reject no song that was not either popular at one time or that remains popular to this day. No standard of poetry has determined Mr. Eggleston's choice. He finds a place for song that is absolutely commonplace and trivial side by side with lyrics of genuine inspiration, merely on the ground that both alike have been the solace of the soldier in camp or on the march. Then, again, modern ballads of old traditions, such as Longfellow's "Paul Revere's Ride," and poems written by gentlemen who took their ease at home while North waged against South in the field, are liberally represented with the simple and stirring chants written by and sung by soldiers. The result is an extremely varied and interesting collection, with useful editorial notes, and charming vignette illustrations and tail-pieces. The second volume is entirely composed of lyrics of the Civil War, like the Bugle Notes of Mr. F. F. Browne, and similar collections previously published. Not a few of the songs are well known, and not a few deserve to be rescued from the obscurity of newspapers and magazines where they first appeared. Here are Mr. Whittier's "Barbara Frietchie" and Mr. Lowell's "Jonathan to John"; Mr. J. W. Palmer's "Stonewall Jackson's Way" and Mr. Lathrop's rousing song of Chancellorsville, "Keenan's Charge"; "The Bay Fight," "Sherman's March to the Sea," "The Conquered Banner," "Marching through Georgia," and so forth. As poetry, the most popular songs, such as "John Brown" and "Tramp, Tramp, Tramp," do not rise above the level of revival or Salvation Army hymns; but they "stirred the hearts of patriots," as Mr. Eggleston says, and are properly included with better things in a martial anthology.

Self-Discipline, by the Rev. Richard Glover, M.A. (Nisbet & Co.), is a memoir of the author's son, a young man who was gifted, we willingly believe, with all the graces and virtues ascribed to him by the writer. "We may see here," writes Mr. Glover, "what Christianity can do for young men. Amongst the 'evidences' that Christianity is indeed of God, we may confidently appeal to such a character as this. It is the testimony of all who know him intimately, that it was as nearly perfect as could be in this fallen world." From this it is plain that Mr. Glover's views on "evidences" are a little odd, and the reader who survives this introductory statement will find other and still more curious "evidences" before he is half through the record of Percy Clabon Glover's boyhood.

Mrs. Haweis, in her Art of Housekeeping (Sampson Low & Co.), has provided young ladies newly wed with an excellent manual of practical advice on the choice and keeping of a house, the engagement and control of servants, dress, food, furniture, and other necessary and troublous matters, together with much sensible "coaching" with respect to "shops and stores, costs and quantities," and other economic mysteries. We have also to note a new edition of Beautiful Houses, by the same writer (Sampson Low & Co.), wherein may be found serviceable hints anent the decoration of the house.

Mr. Alfred Russel Wallace's Travels on the Amazon and Rio Negro (Ward, Lock, & Co.), one of the most delightful and suggestive of modern books of travel, is appropriately added to the "famous books" comprised in the cheap and excellent "Minerva Library," edited by Mr. G. T. Bettany. The new edition is carefully revised by the author, printed in good, clear type, and illustrated by a map and woodcuts.

The miniature "Stott Library," a charming series of bijou reprints, now includes Lamb's Essays of Elia, in two volumes (David Stott), with two beautiful etchings of Edmonton Churchyard and Lamb's cottage at Edmonton. This is the prettiest of all pocket-editions of Elia.

The "O. U. R. Books," a new venture in shilling sensations, comprises, among other stories, The Jaws of Death, by Grant Allen (Simpkin & Co.), and Nurse Revel's Mistake, by Florence Warden (Simpkin & Co.). The former is a blood-freezing recital of an adventure in a waxworks exhibition at San Francisco. Miss Warden's story is full of ingenuity, if not altogether plausible. It tells of the trials of a young prince who is "shadowed" by Russian police, and it introduces a novelty in the art of assassinating kings.

One of the handsomest and most convenient editions of the Greek Testament ever issued has just proceeded from the Clarendon Press (Oxford and Amen Corner), printed on India paper, morocco-bound. There are nearly two hundred pages of critical appendix, while the text occupies more than six hundred. With Dr. Sanday setting in order Bishop Lloyd's recension of sixty years ago and the Westcott-Hort edition collated, not to mention much else, there is little fear of shortcoming in scholarship; while in presentation the book is a model.

In Master of his Fate, by J. Maclaren Cobban (Edinburgh and London: Blackwood & Sons), we find a little of Zanoni, much more of Louis Grayle, a little of the folly that pseudo-scientists hail, a touch of the Wandering Jew, and of deeds that vampires do, of persons hystero-driven, of Frankenstein and Lord Ruthven. And having composed this stuff, Mr. Cobban says "Hold, enough!"

In the "Statesmen" Series Miss Charlotte M. Yonge has contributed a Life of H.R.H. the Prince Consort (Allen & Co.), a skilful example of condensation, and one that utilizes, with excellent results, the abundant material available.

For young people a similar abstract is set forth by Mr. Arthur Montefiore, whose David Livingstone: his Labours and his Legacy (Partridge & Co.), is written in a pleasing style, and well illustrated by woodcuts and maps.

A capital selection, edited by Mr. J. E. Cabot, is the Emerson's Poems (Routledge), recently added to "Routledge's Pocket Library."

Among new editions we have to acknowledge A Roman Singer, by F. Marion Crawford (Macmillan); Beechcroft at Rockstone, by Charlotte M. Yonge (Macmillan); Mr. George Hooper's Waterloo, "Bohn's Standard Library" (Bell & Sons); and Mr. H. D. Traill's Coleridge, "English Men of Letters" Series (Macmillan & Co.)

FLOWER-LAND: an Introduction to Botany. By ROBERT

FISHER, M.A. With 163 Illustrations.

"A popular, readable little book, all about flowers, and how they are formed. The illustrations are clear and beautiful. Any child who is fond of flowers would, after reading this beautiful little volume, long to follow up the study of botany. It is a capital introduction to the subject."—Practical Teacher.

"The book is well printed, and the illustrations are clear and artistic. The method of treatment of the subject is exceedingly simple, and the happily-chosen title, and the floral representations on the cover, combine to form a very attractive volume."—Educational Times.

"It is written in a painstaking spirit, and with a clearness in description an felicity of illustration which are admirable. The plan of studies is well devised, and all that is possible has been done to give sound information in a concise and attractive form."—Leeds Mercury.

"May be commended as a trustworthy guide to the wonders and delights of Flower-land
..... Very much solid botanical knowledge may be easily and pleasantly acquired from a study of this well-written manual."—Public Opinion.

"We do not remember meeting with so suitable a book as this to place in the hands of those who may desire to obtain a knowledge of botany."—Publishers' Circular.

"The almost entire absence of hard terms, the simple and chatty style, and the abundance of good illustrations, combine to render the work both interesting and suitable for young people; whilst the charmingly tasteful binding completes its attractiveness as a present or

Quarto Edition, containing 46 Coloured Maps, carefully drawn, and beautifully engraved on Steel and Copper Plates, and an Alphabetical Index to the Geography of the World. Half-morocco, cloth sides, gilt edges, 30s.; Size, when shut, 12½ in. by 15; weight, 4 lbs. 8 oz.

"It was designed, and several of the maps were drawn and engraved, by Arrowsmith; these are brought up to date, and the additional ones are not unworthy of being placed alongside the work of the chief of English cartographers. They seem all abreast of the latest information, the execution leaves little to be desired, and the colouring is tasteful and really helpful."—Times.

Just published, in a neat cloth box, lettered, 31s. 6d.

CONTENTS:—1. The Fairyland of Science—2. Life and her Children—3. Winners in Life's Race—4. Short History of Natural Science.

"The secret of Miss Buckley's success as a popular expounder of the abstruse results of the highest scientific research is her own mastery of the processes and results. She is content with no second-hand knowledge; she has in all cases gone to the fountain-head."—Times.

The particulars of Miss BUCKLEY'S VOLUMES sold separately are as follows:—

THE FAIRYLAND of SCIENCE. Twenty-first Thousand. Post 8vo. with 74 Illustrations, cloth gilt, gilt edges, 6s.; calf extra, 11s.

Animal Life from the Amœba to the Insects. Twelfth Thousand. Post 8vo. with upwards of 100 Illustrations, cloth gilt, gilt edges, 6s.; calf extra, 11s.

"The work, though mainly intended for children and young persons, may be most advantageously read by many persons of riper age, and may serve to implant in their minds a fuller and clearer conception of 'the promises, the achievements, and claims of science.'"—Journal of Science.

Also, a NEW EDITION of

WINNERS in LIFE'S RACE; or, the Great

and Fifty-five Coloured Illustrations, drawn by HEINRICH LEUTEMANN. With Descriptive Letterpress, edited by ARABELLA B. BUCKLEY. Crown 4to. handsome cloth binding, 10s. 6d.

"A really beautiful child's book. The drawings of the animals are as superior to the old class of picture-book as a portrait by Millais is to a sign-board. The chromo-lithography is also extremely good. In reproducing Leutemann's work for English children, Mrs. Fisher has made considerable alterations, rendered necessary in a book designed for use in our own schoolrooms and nurseries. No more excellent children's Christmas gift-book could be found."—Bookseller.

TRADE-UNION THREATS.

IT may be known by this morning whether the defeat of the attempt of the South Metropolitan Gas-Workers' Union to dictate to the Company is or is not to prove the starting-point of another and a much more serious attempt of the same kind in a much larger district of London. The rumour that the workmen of the Gas Light and Coke Company intend to strike in order to compel Mr. LIVESEY's Board to surrender is indeed a mere rumour. It may be, and even probably is, the offspring of foolish talk on the part of workmen who have no more means of influencing the Gas Light and Coke servants' Union than any other casual portion of the public. We need not believe that the story is the more likely to be true because it has not been contradicted. No doubt the Northern Union has a sympathy with the Southern, and would not be sorry to see Mr. LIVESEY beaten. If it can promote his defeat by allowing stories of its intention to take its own coat off to go about undenied, it may well keep its peace, but is not on that account much the more likely to take the very serious step of calling out its men. But, though rumour is only rumour, and silence does not always mean determination, it will not be matter for much surprise if the Gas Light and Coke Company has been served with notices by its men, or is so served a week hence. The course which the Union is believed to meditate has been adopted by other similar bodies, and is at this moment being followed by the Amalgamated Seamen and Firemen. The history of the last four months shows that a large proportion of the workmen have thoroughly persuaded themselves that they have the right to dictate to the community and the power to enforce their orders. It is an undeniable fact that the success of Mr. LIVESEY would be a blow for the Unions. The South Metropolitan Gas Company denies that it meant to attack the Union, and is entitled to deny it; but it undoubtedly did intend to introduce, and has introduced, a system of working which will diminish the risk of strikes by making unanimous action nearly impossible. The Unions may naturally regard this as an attack, and resent it accordingly. That Unions which have not been thus attacked should feel themselves in danger, and take the offensive, would not be at all surprising after the experience we have had. It would be unwise in them, and selfish too; but then angry men are not commonly judicious, and there would be nothing which should be unexpected in their selfishness.

It is in any case not a waste of time or care to consider the probability of such an event, or to take a little thought as to what should be done in case it did happen. Its occurrence is not shown to be the less likely by the violent language used last Sunday. The threats heard in Hyde Park are at least indications of a disposition on the part of many of the men to violent acts, and it is not uncommonly found to be the case that a violent party can carry with it a majority which has no strong disposition of its own towards disorder. Neither can it be denied—even we should imagine by Mr. MATTHEWS—that there have been, and are, features of the late and present strikes which show that it would be folly, indeed, in view of the police records of the week, if of nothing else, to conclude that violent language will not be interpreted into violent act. The use of force on one side and the manifest fear of force on the other among the workmen themselves afford a sufficient answer to those who attribute little importance to such language as that said to have been used by the stump-orator WEIR. It may be very silly and Irish to bawl out such nonsense as this:—"I say a man like LIVESEY has no moral right to live in this country, and the man would be a hero who went to-night and murdered him." But the fact that such language is Irish is the very reason why it should be considered dangerous. It is this kind of talk which has so commonly been found to go before the heroic determination on the part, not of the speaker, but of some hearer, to go and murder. When Irish style is adopted, so may Irish methods be. It is also surely a question of some pith whether such language is not a criminal offence, however great a fool the speaker may be. We have always been under the impression that to incite to murder was a breach of the law, and we have no doubt that WEIR has incited to murder. Unless we are hopelessly wrong in our law and our facts, the obvious course would seem to be to proceed against WEIR. The authorities have, we hear, been seriously inquiring whether the public interest would be served if this course is taken. This report, which is credible in the highest degree, may be put alongside Mr. MONRO's theory of the proper use of police as examples of the view which "authorities" of all parties now take of the law. We gather from it that, in their opinion, the law is not meant for universal application, imposes no binding obligation, and need not be applied by them as a matter of duty. It is a weapon which is to be used subject to higher considerations of sentiment, political interest, and electoral management. They will, it seems, prosecute WEIR, if at all, not because he has committed an offence, but because they think some interest will be served by his prosecution. So far the report; which is, of course, neither more nor less evidence against the "authorities" or the "proper persons" than it is against the Gas Light and Coke Company's Workers' Union. But in this case also the story has not been denied; nor is it inconsistent with what was known already. Rather the contrary, if the authorities include Mr. MATTHEWS or Mr. MONRO; their hesitation to apply the law which it is their duty to apply is in perfect keeping with the denial that there was organized intimidation, and the refusal to keep order in the docks because they were private property. If these remarkable deliberations have not come to an end, we trust that the following consideration may occur to the official mind and quicken it. There may, we allow, be reasons why it is convenient for a politician to make the law better for the poor than the rich; but it is manifestly injudicious to make it better for the Englishman than the Irishman. Now, if WEIR gets off scatheless it will be applied in this unwisely unequal way. His language is precisely the kind of incitement to outrage for which Mr. O'BRIEN and JOHNDILLON have been subjected to prison and anguish concerning their breeches. It was delivered, too, before audiences of angry men who had already been guilty of outrages. Why, then, since these circumstances are equal, are the consequences not to be equal? We suppose that the answer will be that it is not advisable to make WEIR important by prosecuting him. That is so stale and familiar a piece of cant that its appearance was to be expected on this occasion also. The answer to it has been given a thousand times already, but must be given again. There is no surer way of making an agitator important than by leaving him at liberty to agitate till he produces an effect. Moreover, of the two processes by which he may become important, much the best for the public interest is the endurance of a blood-cooling application of three months' hard labour.

Whether WEIR is made important in this way or not, it behoves London—and the rest of the country too, for that matter—to realize thoroughly what Union rights, as they are understood by the Unions, and apparently by the Home Office, are coming to mean. As now interpreted, they confer the privilege to beset the high road, to stop whomsoever they please, and question him as to his profession, walk, and conversation. In the neighbourhood of the Maxim-Nordenfeldt works at Erith all who have occasion to be out after dark are molested and interrogated in this fashion by knots of men generally well provided with cudgels. It includes the right to collect mobs in the street, to howl threats and abuse, to compel "black-legs" to have recourse to the protection of the police. All this, it seems, is "picketing," and only the just right of the honest working-man. If so, picketing must be a legally established tyranny of the most vexatious description. But we doubt whether the word covers so much, or whether, in fact, this is anything more than the interpretation put on it by official cowardice and laziness. Finally, it would appear that the rights of Unions include the right to inflict danger and loss on the whole community in pursuit of their own advantage. This is what the Amalgamated Society of Seamen and Firemen and, if the uncontradicted report is true, the Gas Light and Coke Company's Union claim to be entitled to do. To some extent every strike is a loss to the nation. Gas-workers, firemen, and sailors are not to be prohibited from striking for their own good against their own employers in their own quarrel on that account. But they are now claiming the right to go far beyond this. They are maintaining that they are entitled to deprive any portion of the community they please of light or coal in order to compel the employers of other men to submit to the terms of other Unions. This is a pure and simple outrage on the community, which it has the right to resent, and to which it would be abject cowardice to submit. If the Beckton Gas-Workers' Union does act as it threatens to do, and if it is obeyed by its men, we shall be perfectly entitled to treat their action as a species of civil war, and to defend ourselves against it. Not only ought the Company to receive the most efficient police protection, but it would be entitled to direct help. In the general interest of the community the Government should take upon itself to supply light. The stokers of the Steam Reserve and the Channel Squadron, and as many of the Royal Engineers as it was thought necessary to supply, should be lent to the Company—for a proper consideration, which the men would receive, of course, over and above their pay. It would be an excellent training for the stokers, and would do the Engineers no harm. That would be, not only a good lesson to the Unions, but would encourage the men who are inclined to stand out against their tyranny to remain firm. And, further, if the struggle is forced on us, it will become necessary to provide that in future an industry of such vital importance as the manufacture of gas should not be left any longer at the mercy of the Unions.

THE DIFFICULTY WITH PORTUGAL.

THERE will be little doubt in the minds of any Englishmen—except that curious section whose motto is "Any country, right or wrong, provided it is not our own"—as to the course which should be pursued towards Portugal, not merely if the reports of the proceedings of Major SERPA PINTO are confirmed, but if the Portuguese Government maintains its present attitude as to the question of sovereignty in the interior. Assuming the account of Senhor BARROS GOMES's conversation with a Daily News Correspondent to be accurate, the difficulty will have to be settled sooner or later, and had much better be settled sooner. Some days ago it was reported that Portugal, while determined, or half determined, to claim the Nyassa and Shiré districts, was not disposed to maintain her sea-to-sea pretensions. It will have been observed that this is not at all the language of the Portuguese Minister. He clings to the Empire of Monomotapa like HENRI V. to the white flag, and actually parades the assent of Germany and France (countries not now concerned) to that monstrous pretension as a reason for not receding from it. Now, until this doctrine is finally disposed of, no safety can be had for the operations of the British South African Company, for the enjoyment of the advantages which have been attained by many years' hard work on the part of the merchants and missionaries on the shores of Lake Nyassa, or for the access to Bechuana and Matabele Land from the sea. It is the kind of claim which it is nearly as dangerous to allow to lie dormant as it is to wink at its open exercise. It must be repeated that no settlement of this matter can be satisfactory which does not confine Portugal to her coast possessions on each side—those coast possessions being outlined as liberally as may be consistent with the general object by England—leaving the interior free to the expansion of English settlers northwards.

The selection of the particular means by which this desirable end has to be attained must, of course, depend upon many things. Hitherto there is no reason to doubt that Lord SALISBURY's language and his proceedings have been quite "correct." To represent the moving of warships to Delagoa Bay as really intended as a provisional retreat for British subjects who are nowhere near Delagoa Bay would be puerile; but the action is a perfectly well understood move in the regular diplomatic game, involving no brag or bluster, but simply giving due notice that one party in a dispute means business and is keeping its powder dry. The position which Lord SALISBURY has apparently taken up, that under no circumstances can England allow the English flag once hoisted by a responsible English officer to be lowered by any one else, is unassailable argumentatively, and it is one for which every Englishman worthy the name ought to be willing to fight to the last. And it may be observed that the Portuguese reply, that the Makololo attacked the Major, not the Major the Makololo, is not only feeble and obvious, but really does not affect the question—which is, How came the said Major to be wandering about with military forces in a district which England does not recognize as Portugal's, and acting against tribes whom England does recognize as being, if only after a fashion, under her protection? Looking at it from this point of view, the importance of settling the matter once for all is quite as clear if "the other boy began it" as if he did not. As a matter of fact, however, nobody, whatever doubts he may retain on details, can doubt which boy did begin it. Major SERPA PINTO's own side have been too imprudent in retailing their hero's plans for there to be any hesitation. And let it be observed that we have nothing to say against the Major. He worked his work like a good Portuguese, and now we have got to work ours like good Englishmen. It must be done in such a way that Portugal may clearly understand that the longer she delays a settlement the more dearly will that settlement cost her; that she may choose between the friendship of England and a safe title to her actual colonial possessions on the one hand, the enmity of England and the probability of loss of more than one of those possessions on the other. And, once more, No arbitration.

AMERICAN WAR SONGS.

WHEN his country's levies went forth to combat the dis-Unionists of that distant day, it will be remembered that Mr. GIFTED HOPKINS, the poet, stayed at home. Others, he said, would do great deeds, and he would sing them. This was a discreet division of labour. It has but rarely chanced that the same person, like ÆSCHYLUS, ACHILLES, and Mr. JINGLE, could both fight and sing about fighting. As a rule, whatever the reason may be, the martial poets have much preferred a peaceful literary career. Mr. EGGLESTON, the Editor of American War Ballads (PUTNAM), admits that this is the case. The poets "are not the men who do the fighting. . . . It was the gentle Master of Abbotsford that interpreted the daring deeds of knightly times in song and story." The instance is not very well chosen. "Abbotsford and Kaeside" was not so gentle as all that. It was his misfortune, not his fault, that he was an advocate, not a hussar, and even in his old age he showed a most bloodthirsty desire to fight a French General. But Mr. EGGLESTON does not sneer at the division of labour which makes Mr. BOKER strike the lyre, for example, and General SHERMAN bang the field-piece. Some of us are poets; some of us are fighting men; some of us are neither; and it may be admitted that, if most of these Western war-cries were not uttered by soldiers, neither are they exactly the work of poets.

There are very few good fighting songs in the world, if by "good" we mean touched with the qualities of poetry. About MACAULAY's Lays it is yet a question with some (not with us) whether they are poetry or whether Mr. ARNOLD was right when he said they were pinchbeck. AYTOUN's Lays of the Scottish Cavaliers are of the same sort; perhaps we may say that The Island of the Scots and The Battle of Lake Regillus have both the quality which SIDNEY attributed to Cherry Chace. But both these pieces are concerned with fights fought long ago, which more naturally lend themselves to poetry than the struggles of the moment. We have but very few good poems on contemporary battles; and perhaps the Americans, if this collection be representative, are still more sadly to seek for a TYRTEUS. We miss an energetic ballad (included, we think, by Mr. BRANDER MATTHEWS) showing how "they bloodied up that day." To bloody up, like to liquor up, is a thoroughly native American expression.

After one or two very funny, and not at all American, colonial ballads on the old Indian scuffles, we find, of course, the American eagle shrieking defiance at this old country, which, whether tyrannical or not, was exceedingly inefficient. In 1774, for example, Mr. WARREN was writing in this emancipated manner:—

Some future day shall crown us,
The masters of the main,
Our fleets shall speak in thunder
To England, France, and Spain;
And the nations over the ocean spread
Shall tremble and obey
The sons, the sons, the sons,
Of brave America.

But why defy France and Spain, or why not throw in Russia and Turkey? It may not be generally known in the States—we have heard that it is not much insisted on in education—but the French were actually the allies of Mr. WARREN's victorious countrymen. Mr. PHILIP FRENEAU contents himself (1775) with bidding Britain "Go on, to be damned if she will." Mr. PETER ST. JOHN strikes a lowlier note:—

I'll give a true relation,
Attend to what I say
Concerning the taxation
Of North America.

There are few poems here by well-known names; the best known is Mr. BRYANT's, of whom Mr. LOWELL daringly remarked once that it was indiscreet to call him the American WORDSWORTH. Mr. LOWELL, audax juvenis, added that WORDSWORTH was more precious by himself than all the batch of his American contemporaries. That the reader may form an opinion of his own, we present him with a patriotic stave by Mr. BRYANT:—

Grave men there are by broad Santee,
Grave men with hoary hairs;
Their hearts are all with Marion,
For Marion are their prayers.
And lovely ladies greet our band
With kindest welcoming,
With smiles like those of summer,
And tears like those of spring.
For them we wear these trusty arms,
And lay them down no more
Till we have driven the Briton
Forever from our shore.

Well, we were driven from the shores, not a doubt of it, and perhaps it would be affectation to maintain that we withdrew in alarm at the local poetry. No one could have faced that, and yet it is not very attractive. The ballad of the Constitution and the Guerrière is interesting, because it either suggested our ballad of the Chesapeake and the Shannon or was suggested by it. Americans prefer the former alternative, and have some evidence on their side. The piece called Yankee Thunders, no doubt, if the Americans insist on it, suggested to CAMPBELL Ye Mariners of England. But we fancy that even the most patriotic American critic will admit that, as far as poetry goes, CAMPBELL improved on his model. Here is a specimen of Yankee Thunders:—

Hence be our floating bulwark
'Tis mighty Heaven's plain decree—
Then take the wat'ry field!
To ocean's farthest barrier then
Your whit'ning sail shall pour;
Safe they'll ride o'er the tide,
While Columbia's thunders roar,
While her cannon's fire is flashing fast,
And her Yankee thunders roar.

The Civil War supplies the great majority of the ballads. Here, again, the well-known American poets are, for some reason, conspicuously absent. Either they did not care to sing of fraternal broils, or they have preferred not to be represented. Dr. WENDELL HOLMES, on South Carolina, produces a lament, not a battle-piece. Mr. EDMUND CLARENCE STEDMAN struck the very earliest lyre after war broke out, and with Mr. BOKER continued to be one of the most military minstrels. Here is a piece of the first Civil War poem:—

Came the morning of that day,
When the God to whom we pray,
Gave the soul of Henry Clay
To the land;
How we loved him—living, dying!
But his birthday banners flying,
Saw us asking and replying,
Hand to hand.

For we knew that far away,
Round the fort at Charleston bay,
Hung the dark impending fray,
Soon to fall;
And that Sumter's brave defender
Had the summons to surrender:
Seventy loyal hearts and tender—
That was all.

On the whole, this paean rather fortifies our opinion that war, like love, regret, and other passions, is better written about after it has been for some time in the past. But it is hardly fair for distant readers, in cold blood, to criticize verses written in strong emotion. The English reader may not know exactly "where Slocum stood" "with gallant Sprague," and yet the spot may be as sacred to an American as Flodden or Albuera, Falkirk or the ford of the Douro. Sprague and gallant Slocum, fortisque Gyas, fortisque Cloanthus, they also deserve their minstrels, better minstrels than most soldier men generally get. However thin the poetry may be, the patriotism is sound and exemplary on both sides, and both sides showed a lesson to modern Englishmen in being true to their party and themselves. That is the root of the matter, and if we do not think the verse of these military chansons very good, the editor, Mr. EGGLESTON, seems very much of the same modest opinion. It is odd that in all that fire of excitement so very few durable pieces of verse, permanent as bronze, were cast; but so it chanced. Nobody can test beforehand what condition of affairs will produce literature. Americans themselves will admit that their best men, EMERSON, BRYANT, LONGFELLOW, HAWTHORNE, POE, flourished before the War, and, if they lived through it, gained nothing from it, while they who follow, the Epigoni, have no particularly martial merits.

MR. STANLEY'S EXPLANATION.

IT was to be expected that Mr. STANLEY's song of triumph would be changed a little when he came to learn the opinions of critics on some of his recent performances, and the expectation has been fulfilled. He has not, of course, yet seen any detailed criticism on his latest utterances. But newspaper cuttings seem to have reached him in camp at the south end of the Victoria Nyanza last August, and he sat down to expose, once for all, the "lack of common sense" and the "utter disregard of accuracy" shown by the writers. It is a very odd thing how frequently lack of common sense and utter disregard of accuracy in the critic do surprise the person criticized, especially if he happens to entertain a very strong, and in the case of Mr. STANLEY a very well justified, opinion of his own abilities. But the condition of surprise is not always the most favourable to impartial consideration, especially in matters affecting oneself, and it may be worth while impartially to examine Mr. STANLEY's examination.

We are sorry to find in the earlier part of it something more than traces of that irritation with EMIN which has already shown itself so unpleasantly. But it is impossible to discuss this matter properly until we have—what at present is entirely wanting—EMIN's own account of the matter. We shall merely observe, in passing, that we cannot quite reconcile Mr. STANLEY's present account of the Pasha's condition and prospects when he himself reached the Albert Nyanza with the accounts which he has previously given. As regards Major BARTELOT and TIPPOO TIB, Mr. STANLEY has "seen more nonsense on this subject than on any other." These are brave words, and Mr. STANLEY follows them up with a column and a half of Special Correspondent thunder. It does not come to much, if we may be pardoned a simpler style than his own. It is, however, interesting to note that now, when he is concerned to justify Major BARTELOT in order to justify himself, he takes an entirely different tone from the ungenerous fault-finding with his dead lieutenant which we recently had to deplore. He now admits that the advance of the rearguard was prevented by "tantalizing delays, with constant fair promises on the part of the Arabs." As for his vindication of BARTELOT and JAMESON against the preposterous charge of conniving at cannibalism among the Manyema we are quite at one with Mr. STANLEY; as, also, in regard to the cock-and-bull repetition and transference to Africa of the photograph-and-execution story which made such a noise in Burmah. But all this is agreed matter between reasonable folk. The really interesting point is Mr. STANLEY's defence of his bargain with TIPPOO

TIB. The very beginning of this shows "the difference of the point of view." It ought not to be news to Englishmen—we fear it will be to some—that but a few years ago Mr. DEANE, a gallant Englishman now dead, held the Congo post of Stanley Falls against the Arabs, in defence of a runaway female slave from certain death by torture; made the best fight of the kind done by an Englishman, except Rorke's Drift, for years; and, when deserted by his men, made good his way through the foe. Mr. STANLEY calls this "the error of judgment which induced Captain DEANE to defy the Arabs for the sake of a lying woman who had fled from her master to avoid punishment." We are not rabid against slavery, but we very seriously trust that no Englishman will ever fail to commit similar "errors of judgment." Mr. STANLEY, however, thinks them errors, and piously summons Scripture to his aid in "re-joicing" over the "sinner" TIPPoo, who has "repented" (under the influence of 30*l.* a month) and thereby "saved thousands of lives." Does Mr. STANLEY include Major BARTELOT's in these thousands? We fear he has not sufficiently appreciated the charges and allegations brought against him—indeed, at the distance and in the circumstances he could hardly do so. But his attitude in the TIPPoo matter is unfortunately impenitent, and his attitude in the EMIN matter unfortunately aggressive. Let us only rejoice that he has, at any rate, disproved his own ungenerous reflections on Major BARTELOT.

IRELAND.

WE should not like to prophesy that the decision of the Queen's Bench Division on Mr. O'BRIEN's application for a new trial of his action against Lord SALISBURY will not even yet be traced by the Parnellite press to political bias. It is true that neither Mr. Justice FIELD nor Mr. Justice MANISTY has attained to the distinguished place occupied by Sir JAMES STEPHEN as a mark for Nationalist abuse. For a moment, doubtless, the most ingeniously inventive slanderer in Mr. O'BRIEN's party, or even on Mr. O'BRIEN's paper, will be unable to find a ready excuse for charging the two former judges with prejudice against the Irish race and the Irish "cause"; but we repeat we should not like to prophesy, or undertake to put a limit to the foul births of calumny which the future may have in store for us. In the meanwhile, however, it will be a satisfaction to most Englishmen to feel that the only possible exception that can be taken to the judgment of the two judges in question is that it errs, if anywhere, on the side of being over-minute and cautious in its weighing of all the points that could possibly be urged in support of the plaintiff's contention. More than six months ago when the action, since decided in Lord SALISBURY's favour, was only threatening, we took occasion to point out how agreeable was the paradox of finding the Editor of United Ireland suing the statesman whom the Parnellite press is in the habit of describing as the head of a "Government of murderers" for having insinuated that his (the Editor's) words appeared calculated to encourage the commission of outrage; and we further indulged in speculating as to what, under less paradoxical relations than those of "injured agitators" to their English traducers, would have been the reception to be expected for Mr. O'BRIEN's complaint. We even went, in the audacity of our imagination, so far as to picture Mr. O'BRIEN pouring his wrongs into the ear of a sympathetic friend—a lamentation in the course of which he would have to admit that while it was matter of common knowledge that landgrabbers and emergency men had for years past been exposed to murder and outrage in Ireland, he went into a particular district of the country and reminded the inhabitants that "the air of the place was not a wholesome climate for landgrabbers"; that he was "afraid they were living and thriving" in his hearers' midst; that he "need not go into particulars," but that if "all the labours of himself and friends for the past ten years had not been in vain," the people he was addressing "ought to know how to deal with the landgrabber without instructions from the man who was addressing them." And we further hazarded an opinion that in the days before the present reign of Topsy-turveydom the impartial person who received this account of matters, and who was then told that some malicious person had interpreted this language as an incitement to murder and outrage, would have simply replied, "If you did "not intend such incitement—and I fully accept your assurance that you did not—why did you use the language? You have only yourself to thank for the misconstruction. Do not go to law, for no jury will give you any damages."

Well, Mr. O'BRIEN, as everybody knows, did go to law, and the jury before whom his action was tried not only gave him no damages, but did not even give him a verdict. They found for the defendant, after a most careful and impartial summing-up by Mr. Justice STEPHEN; and, in so doing, we have no hesitation in saying, they expressed the opinion of ninety-nine out of every hundred men—even, we would add, of politicians, if we except those disreputable specimens of the class who are only to be found in its very highest and its very lowest orders. Had the verdict implied, or had it been possible for it to convey in so many words, the intimation that the jury really did not profess to know or care whether Mr. O'BRIEN intentionally incited to murder and outrage or not, but that they were most decidedly of opinion that a man who deliberately used the shameful language above reported would have no claim to damages if the affirmative one of the two above constructions were placed on it by a commentator—had the verdict in Mr. O'BRIEN v. Lord SALISBURY amounted even to this, we do not, for our own part, think, neither do we believe that the great majority of the public will think, that Mr. O'BRIEN would have had the slightest cause of complaint against any one. He would have only had himself to thank for it if he had left the court without being able to extract from its proceedings any acquittal of the charge of wilfully instigating his hearers to the commission of crime. He has, therefore, all the more reason to congratulate himself on the good fortune and on the scrupulous fairness of English tribunals, that the trial has incidentally been the means of procuring him that species of purgation from the worst of the charges which might have been based on his speech at Ballyneale. For Mr. Justice STEPHEN left it to the jury to say whether what Lord SALISBURY said imputed to Mr. O'BRIEN that he had intentionally incited people to murder or outrage; that, "if so, it was not justified" and that they must find for the plaintiff; but that, "if the fair effect of the words complained of was that the language used by Mr. O'BRIEN was calculated to have that effect, then they should consider, with reference to the whole circumstances of the case, whether the words were in the nature of fair comment and fair inference from the facts, and, if so, find for the defendant." We may remark, in passing, on the singular perversion of meaning which the word "calculated" has in recent years undergone when we thus find it used in actual opposition to "designed"; but in the later and now quite well-established acceptance of the word there could not certainly be the smallest doubt of its applicability in this connexion to Mr. O'BRIEN's Ballyneale speech. The jury had probably no doubt whatever that to denounce landgrabbers in the language of that speech was an act which was distinctly "calculated" to lead to the commission of crime and outrage; but they were not even required to go as far as this in order to arrive at their verdict. They had simply to say, in effect, whether the conclusion in question was one which a fair commentator on Mr. O'BRIEN's speech might not unreasonably arrive at. And, now that the charge under which they were guided to their decision has been passed under elaborate review by two other judges, we should imagine that even the plaintiff's advisers themselves would be puzzled to put his case in any new or more favourable light. Of the two grounds of his motion—namely, that of misdirection, and the contention that the verdict was against the evidence—the former, weak as it was, was the less absurd. The contention that the judge ought to have withdrawn the question of construction from the jury altogether, and to have ruled, as a matter of law, that Lord SALISBURY's words could only have the meaning put upon them in the plaintiff's innuendo, comes with no very good grace from members and allies of the party which plumes itself on Mr. Fox's Libel Act, and it was no less untenable than unbecoming. As to the contention that the verdict was against the evidence, it virtually amounts to this—that not only is it unjustifiable to say of a man who throws the lighted end of a cigar into a powder magazine that he meant to blow it up, but that an expressed opinion that his act is calculated to produce that result is not merely an erroneous one, but one so patently perverse and malicious that whosoever expresses it ought to be made to answer for it in damages.

Even Mr. O'BRIEN himself will, perhaps, admit that, if a jury had declared Lord SALISBURY's criticisms to be actionable, it would for the future have been a task of very serious difficulty to criticize Parnellite movements of any kind in Ireland without exposing oneself to grave pecuniary risk. What, for instance, is Mr. O'BRIEN's own notion of fair comment on the latest example of the "moral suasion" preached by that admirably conceived and composed body, the Tenants' Defence Association? A few Sundays ago notices were found posted at the Lordship Roman Catholic Chapel, near Dundalk, county Louth, to the following effect:—"Beware of traitors! JOHN KENDALL was asked "to subscribe to the Tenants' Defence Association. When "he puts up his land for auction next week, men of Lordship say No. Any person who takes this land will "suffer." JOHN KENDALL is a Protestant tenant-farmer who was called upon by the collector of the Tenants' Defence Fund to pay a subscription. Having no sympathy with the association, he declined to do so, and the result was that he was boycotted. The auction referred to in the above notice was for the purpose of disposing of his land in accordance with the usual custom, for the crop of oats and potatoes. In consequence of the notice the auction was boycotted, and not a single bid was made. Would it be "fair comment," legitimate criticism on this, in Mr. O'BRIEN's opinion, to say that the new Tenants' Defence Association is only the old National League writ large, and that its proceedings bid fair to deserve as much attention from Mr. BALFOUR as those of the League itself? Because this is the comment that many of us would like to make on it, if the susceptibilities of Parnellites—perhaps rendered more acute by the fact that leaders of the Gladstonian party have publicly blessed the new and strictly "legal" movement, and bidden it God speed—will permit us to do so.

THE BISHOP OF DURHAM.

EVEN in periods of which sound popular judgment is not the most ordinary characteristic there are usually found one or two righteous men about whom the world, righteous or wicked, makes, for a wonder, no mistake. Of such was the great theologian and excellent Bishop who died last Saturday. The comparison of Dr. LIGHTFOOT to his still greater predecessor, Bishop BUTLER, was inevitable, and can but be repeated; for the combination of theological and controversial eminence with simplicity and sanctity of private character is, unluckily, not so common that its recurrence in holders of the same office should not be noticeable. If Dr. LIGHTFOOT had not BUTLER's far-reaching originality of mind, or those profound thoughts on subjects other than theological which the scanty records of the conversation and personality of the author of the Analogy show, he had, on the other hand, much greater learning and pure scholarship, and a far more attractive gift of English style. In purely ecclesiastical, as opposed to theological, views he held a somewhat "lower" standard—in the technical, or rather the cant, sense of "low"—than the earlier JOSEPH of Durham; and it is curious that on these points only was there some exception to his almost invariable and Achillean success in controversy. On the translation of the Lord's Prayer and on the history of the Apostolic succession he took less Conservative views than were usual with him, and enforced them with less vigour.

But, on the whole, Dr. LIGHTFOOT's position was much the same—the circumstances altering and altered with the case—as that of his predecessor and of the other great orthodox champions of the first half of the last century. Once more the least numerous and most isolated branch of the Catholic Church supplied the forces to meet and rout the armies of the aliens. It is unnecessary to discuss here the reasons—they are, indeed, plain enough and numerous enough—which have twice at least brought this peculiar honour to the Church of England. It has only to be hoped that here, as elsewhere, the sons will not be unworthy of the fathers. To any one who knows what controversy really means the reading of such work as Dr. LIGHTFOOT's recently republished criticisms on Supernatural Religion, after the much-vaunted work of German theologians, or atheologians of the present day, or of their imitators and admirers in England, is like reading a proposition of Euclid after a speech of Mr. GLADSTONE's. This combination of logic with learning has (it is not at first sight apparent why, unless the degradation of logic itself as a study be the cause) become extraordinary of late years, though there was a time when it was almost usual. But there is no doubt that, with what may be in no offensive sense called the vulgar, the reputation of Dr. LIGHTFOOT was enormously increased by the conviction that he possessed a third quality, besides learning and logic, the quality of perfect honesty. It is vain for paradoxers to argue, though the argument may be technically good, that if a man's premisses are known to be firmly based on fact, and his processes are evidently conducted with rigid strictness, his personal belief in his conclusions, as far as they are matter of opinion, does not matter. The mass of men will never agree with this, and perhaps the mass of men are not wrong. That Dr. LIGHTFOOT was as convinced of the truth of his creed as any charcoal-burner or any curate, that had he not been so convinced all the professorships and canonries and bishoprics in the world would never have tempted him for one minute to hold a brief for Christianity or for religion:—these were things which those who were in a position to know knew, and which those who were not in a position to know accepted, and rightly accepted, without hesitation. In days when it is often taken as a proof of brains, and a proof of honesty, that a man does not "believe," that he holds everything an open question, it is no small crown of glory for a champion of orthodoxy to have been held in general opinion to have possessed at once one of the hardest and best stored heads and one of the sincerest hearts.

THE LATEST SCANDAL OF THE DIVORCE COURT.

THE verdict of the jury in the FRENCH-BREWSTER case is so absolutely satisfactory that not a word need be said in defence or justification of it. If they had cleared Mr. FRENCH-BREWSTER, or condemned his wife, they would have been responsible for a monstrous iniquity, and the Divisional Court would no doubt on application have ordered a new trial. When a disagreeable case has been rightly decided there is usually small temptation to comment upon it. But there are reasons which take this particular action out of the ordinary rule, and the lessons which the proceedings teach ought to be enforced upon the public mind. A single sentence from the SOLICITOR-GENERAL's reply illustrates very well the gravest aspect of this wretched story. "If," said Sir EDWARD CLARKE, "the evidence of JOHNSON and BERRY is "true, the charge against Mrs. FRENCH-BREWSTER and Captain "ORMSBY-GORE is conclusively proved; if it is not, it is the "result of the most amazing and wicked conspiracy ever "heard of in a court of justice." The jury have found that the evidence of these men was not true, and all the world agrees with the jury. But what is the alternative? If the incredibly disgusting testimony of Mrs. FRENCH-BREWSTER's accusers be false, as it is false, there can be no question of exaggeration or mistake. It is a "wicked conspiracy" to ruin the character of a virtuous woman for money, or spite, or both. It is not the practice of the Divorce Court to order prosecutions for perjury, and Mr. Justice BUTT made no exception in this instance. But the judge is not the sole motive power in such a case. We do not refer to the possibility of a private prosecution. Mrs. FRENCH-BREWSTER cannot be expected voluntarily to mix herself up with anything so foul and loathsome as the instruments employed against her. We are, of course, aware that there is no real Public Prosecutor in this country—the more's the pity. But there is the Treasury, and there is the Treasury Solicitor. Sir AUGUSTUS STEPHENSON, with his three thousand a year, has not been distinguishing himself of late. The extremely frivolous charge of murder against a solicitor at Southampton was directly promoted by the Treasury, and on another occasion, during the recent Assizes, Mr. Justice WILLS protested vigorously against the conduct of the same department in putting a doctor upon his trial for what was at most a professional blunder. If BERRY and JOHNSON were indicted for perjury or conspiracy, the voice of criticism would be silent. If KENDALL, the private detective, were included in the indictment, he would have an opportunity of showing that he was a necessity as well as an evil. As for Mr. FRENCH-BREWSTER, he must, if he have any spark of decency left in him, be eager to prove that he was an innocent dupe and not a guilty accomplice. In all the annals of justice, civil or criminal, there has not been a more bestial fabrication than the produced and prepared handkerchief. We venture to say that there are hundreds of men undergoing imprisonment at this moment in the gaols of this country who would be ashamed to take part in such an outrage on the instincts of humanity.

There are plenty of plausible arguments against this sort of prosecution. The Divorce Court, whatever else may be said of it, is undoubtedly a school of hard swearing. If criminal proceedings were always instituted when the witnesses on one side or the other must have forsworn themselves, a large percentage of divorce cases would have to be tried over again. By an established practice, which has acquired the force of law, there must be two witnesses to every assignment of perjury. On an indictment for perjury the presumption of innocence would be reversed, and the alleged perjurers, instead of their victim, would be entitled to the benefit of the doubt. The scandal and the injury to public morals would be doubled if cases had in this way to be tried twice over. We should be in danger of approaching the Hindoo solicitor's paradise, where every civil suit may be made to yield, first, an arraignment for perjury, and, secondly, an action for malicious prosecution. With all respect for these considerations and for those who urge them, we cannot help thinking that they have been pushed far enough, if not too far. Examples could easily be cited where conflicting evidence was so doubtful that one jury might find one way and another jury might take the opposite view. Nor would it be difficult to find illustrations of the undoubted fact that evidence good enough to decide a disputed claim may fail in the completeness of demonstration which a verdict of guilty requires. But this classification is not exhaustive. There are trumped-up charges which break down so utterly and so ignominiously that the wickedness of those who concocted them is openly displayed. In most tribunals such an exposure is followed, or is liable to be followed, by punishment. In the Divorce Court it has come to be recognized that any lie, however calumnious, may be told with absolute impunity. Let us suppose that an unscrupulous husband wishes to get rid of his wife, but knows that her behaviour has always been perfectly correct. He ascertains that on a particular afternoon she was alone for an hour with a male friend. He goes to a private detective, as little troubled with moral principles as himself, and offers him a thousand pounds for proof that she committed adultery at the specified time and place. Why should the detective hesitate? Whatever happens, he gets his thousand pounds. If he succeeds, he obtains a good advertisement as well. If he fails, he has nothing to fear, and the creatures whom he employs are equally safe. We are not suggesting that anything of this sort occurred in the present instance. Both KENDALL and Mr. FRENCH-BREWSTER may be capable of having believed BERRY and JOHNSON. But such a plot as we have sketched is perfectly possible, inasmuch as it involves no risk to anybody except the lady to whom it is directed. Private detectives are pests of society. But if society cannot get rid of them altogether, it may at least impress upon their minds that the failure of an attempt to ruin an honest woman will cause every man concerned in it to curse the day he was born. A more awful crime cannot be imagined, and hanging is too good for the miscreants who perpetrate it.

As Mr. FRENCH-BREWSTER would not commit perjury, we are bound to assume that he would not suborn it. But the FRENCH-BREWSTER case, with its curious and suspicious resemblance to certain other cases, shows the peril to which innocent women are exposed, and from which they ought to be protected. It should be remembered that Mrs. FRENCH-BREWSTER was the first to move. She sought a separation from her husband because he had deserted her. He thereupon retaliated by accusing her of adultery, well knowing that he was guilty of it himself. It is not often that a man, however depraved, makes such a simultaneous exhibition of his sense and his manners. His treatment of Mrs. FRENCH-BREWSTER was so mean and despicable as to make her long forbearance as creditable as it is amazing. Seldom, indeed, has such an incident been described in a court of justice as this man's request that his own wife might be turned out of the garden-party given by the Royal Yacht Squadron at Cowes. His letters to her were as brutal as they were stupid, and that is saying a great deal. His endeavour to evade the consequences of legal desertion was so childish as, coupled with this deliberate stirring of the matrimonial mud, to excite suspicion of an intellect disordered by malice. Sir CHARLES RUSSELL did not go beyond the truth when he said that, "without any information of misconduct by his wife, this gentleman, through his solicitor, gave a roving commission, "with unlimited credit, to two detectives in order that "they might see whether in Dublin, in London, or in Cairo, they could get some kind of case against her." He failed with the ignominy he deserved. But he might have succeeded. Juries are fallible. Even Sir CHARLES RUSSELL cannot be sure of turning a knave inside out. Mr. Justice BUTT is not a master in his own Court, like Sir JAMES HANNEN. If the charge against Mrs. FRENCH-BREWSTER had been proved, she would have lost her reputation for ever, and been turned unprotected on the world. It has been disproved, partly by its inherent absurdity, partly by the denials of herself and Captain ORMSBY-GORE. Mr. FRENCH-BREWSTER, said to be a very rich man, loses nothing but costs. The discredited witnesses lose nothing at all. Is this fair play? For the infamous lies told of Mrs. FRENCH-BREWSTER there is not, and there never has been, the faintest shadow of excuse. They were, "like the father that begat them, gross as a mountain, open, palpable." It is the bounden duty of the Treasury to get at the bottom of this matter, and to see for themselves whether there has not been a deliberate conspiracy to defeat the ends of justice by the basest of all means. There can be no question of "oath against oath." Mrs. FRENCH-BREWSTER and Captain ORMSBY-GORE have both given in the box a categorical and circumstantial denial of the whole tale. If the history of that handkerchief remains uninvestigated, justice in the Divorce Court is too lame to be of much use.

This revolting trial, with its horrible actualities and its still more dreadful possibilities, has naturally turned people's minds to the remarkable essays of Mr. GLADSTONE and Mr. PHELPS on the evils of divorce. It is a strange and an instructive fact that both these distinguished essayists should have arrived by very different roads at a conclusion adverse to divorce altogether. Mr. GLADSTONE approaches the question from the religious and ecclesiastical point of view. Mr. PHELPS discusses it as a lawyer and a man of the world. Mr. GLADSTONE's argument that, if conjugal infidelity itself dissolves marriage, the guilt of both parties can make no difference, is unanswerable, though, of course, opposite inferences may be drawn from the conclusion. The consequences which Mr. PHELPS shows to have arisen from the laxity of the marriage laws in the United States are undeniably most grave, though the diversity of American law is at least as striking as its looseness, and probably quite as mischievous. Perhaps, considering the fundamental differences in this respect between England and Scotland, it is not for us to talk. But, whatever may be thought of divorce from any point of view—moral, social, or religious—there can be no doubt of the scandals to which it gives rise as at present administered here. We have already dwelt upon the immunity afforded to conspiracy and perjury. It is not enough that legal proceedings should be fair and reasonable. They ought also to be decorous. The scenes which Mr. Justice BUTT permits, and sometimes almost appears to encourage, are offensive and unseemly. Sir JAMES HANNEN aims at preserving the gravity and stillness of a church. Mr. Justice BUTT, if he had an ideal, would perhaps look for it rather in a music-hall. We are no advocates for private trials, and we severely criticized the course taken by Mr. Justice DENMAN in MALAN v. YOUNG. But a court of justice is not a place of amusement, and one need not be a Pharisee or a Puritan to dislike seeing the dissolution of the marriage tie accompanied by a chorus of laughter. Indecency is neither so rare nor so funny as to make these ebullitions essential to the administration of justice. It is not likely, whether it be desirable or not, that the Divorce Act will be repealed. The abuses of the old law, when divorce was the privilege of wealth, are too recent and too glaring, though it seems to be generally forgotten that they still exist in Ireland. But if divorce be a necessary evil, there is all the more reason for purifying it, as far as possible, from the taint of fraud. To post up over the door of any tribunal "Here perjury may be committed with impunity" is dangerous in the extreme. If that tribunal happens to be the Divorce Court, this universal lenity may shake the foundations of family life.

BETTERMENTS.

THE London County Council proposes to ask Parliament to sanction "betterment taxation." In a Bill to enable that body "to widen and improve the Strand" at Holywell Street there is a clause to this effect: Since the proposed improvement will or may add to the value of land and houses round about, any such increase of value "should be reserved wholly or in part for the ratepayers" at whose expense the works have been carried out. Therefore a special rent-charge should be imposed on all property bettered by the Strand improvements. The total of this rent-charge is not to exceed, when capitalized, one-half of the whole cost of the works, and the assessment is to be determined in each case by a calculation of the amount of benefit conferred. That is the principle of the thing; and the framers of the Bill have been careful to plan certain machinery of assessment, arbitration, &c., which in itself seems tolerable enough. And so, indeed, is the principle. It has happened, many times, that street improvements have been carried out which, while they were of considerable benefit to the community at large, have added a particular value to the property through which they ran. Moreover, it has happened that the owners of this property have been paid to permit the very improvements which enhanced its worth. That is not likely to occur again; and when it is contended that property improved at the expense of the ratepayers should make some contribution to the cost of the improvement, equity must assent. It is too sound a principle to be denied; but whether it is capable of adoption without overbalancing inconveniences and disadvantages is still in doubt.

As for this particular proposal, there is something about it which could not have been intended to allay suspicion—suspicion that the extremely "democratic" authors of the Bill have more in their minds than the immediate purpose of it. What are these Strand improvements? They are comprised within an inconsiderable space by the removal of the block of buildings south of the very short street of Holywell, together with the south side of that street itself, which runs up to the Law Courts on the east. In addition, a range of shops north of St. Mary-le-Strand Church (which lies west of Holywell Street) is to be taken down, so as to make a good thoroughfare. Here we have a slice of improvement on one side of the way, and of no greater length than St. Paul's Churchyard. Now let us look to the area which has been marked off by the Council for taxation. On the north, which is the improvement side, it extends from Wellington Street to Temple Bar, and back almost to Lincoln's Inn, the Law Courts being excluded. On the opposite side of the Strand it stretches to the river's edge for the same distance, and here the Temple property is shut out, for no apparent reason. To any one who knows the district, the inclusion of this great sweep of property in the scheme of "betterments" must be rather astonishing. The line of boundary is more than a mile long. Of course it will be said that, though the scheduled district is a wide one, only such houses, only such bits of land, as really profit by the improvement will be assessed; the rest will remain untaxed. It is a plausible answer, but we may fairly suspect an intention of assuming that the whole of this area must be benefited in some measure. Though a house may not profit to the tune of twenty pounds a year the owner might find it difficult to prove that he has not benefited to the extent of twenty shillings; and it would be safe to calculate that very few men of business—and the whole of this district is peopled by busy men—would incur the annoyance and expense of contesting an assessment so inconsiderable. That may not be the calculation of the framers of the Strand Improvements Bill, but yet it may be; and it has only to be brought into play whenever and wherever similar works are undertaken to render a County Council measure for taxing house and land almost unnecessary. Within certain areas, at any rate, the thing will be done in disguise.

Other questions have arisen in the newspaper correspondence with which this scheme has been pelted. The argument that if the principle of "betterment taxation" is to be adopted, it should be adopted for the whole country by an Act of common application, seems at first sight of small effect; considering that if the betterments clause of the London County Council Bill passes, the principle will be thoroughly established thereby, as Parliament must know. But procedure by a Bill of common application would be preferable for this reason: the debate of such a measure would bring more sharply into view all that the admission of the principle implies or is likely to entail. Now the London scheme is obviously connected with the doctrine of "unearned increment" in all its branches; and to say that is to point our meaning sufficiently for the day.

But, fundamentals apart, it seems clear that a proposal sound enough in itself and by itself (in point of principle) would be extremely harassing in execution. We have already pointed out that under such a Bill as this, hundreds of men at first, thousands as betterment taxation extended, might be subjected to fancy imposts too small to justify the risks and worries of resistance, but totally unreasonable and therefore exasperating. Groups of house-owners might combine to resist, no doubt, whereby some inconveniences would be obviated; but when the question is whether the houses in a given neighbourhood have not been bettered to the extent of a pound a year by some improvement two, three, or six hundred yards off, who is to prove that there has been no such benefit if a general rise in rent-value can be shown? For, be it observed, by this Bill the Council has three years from the completion of the works in which to make its claim; and how many London districts fail to show some rise in rent-values in three years, with or without "improvements"? The difficulty of discrimination would be extreme wherever a combination of causes led to a rise of rent value; and, unless the Council made an extravagantly wide sweep, in no such case could a betterment claim of small amount be hopefully resisted. And of course the same difficulty would arise when the question was not whether there had been any betterment at all, but only the amount of it. How is that question to be disentangled? How is the more or less of betterment to be marked off as due to the Council's road-makers—with two sets of experts vowed to opposite opinions, and none of them capable, from the nature of the case, of going beyond a guess? Nor is it to be forgotten that as rents rise the assessment of rates is increased; from which it appears that, when the value of house and land is enhanced by "metropolitan improvement," something is paid back in local as well as imperial taxation. And then what is to be done when a metropolitan improvement puts down the value of neighbouring property? That may happen. It would be easy to adduce such cases. And "if a man have a house in each of two streets affected by the scheme, one being improved, but the other injured, by the diversion of traffic, is he to have the gain taken on the one hand and submit to the loss on the other"? So the question has been put, and there is only one way of answering it if equity is to speak for us all through the business. Yet nothing can be found in the London Council's Bill about compensation where A loses advantages that may be carried to B's door and there assessed for taxation.

A great deal more might be said to show how doubtful and delicate a matter we have to deal with here; and much more will be said if the betterments clause of the Strand Improvements Bill goes before the House of Commons. Of course the theory is good; the principle on which the clause is founded is sound enough. But we may fairly doubt whether, if that principle passes into law, it will not become an avenue for projects of the most objectionable kind au fond; while it is already clear that, as embodied in the Strand Improvements Bill, it is likely to work out in a costly and unjust way. It cannot possibly work with anything approaching to precision. "Betterments taxation" is taxation that must be arbitrary and uncertain; which is about the worst thing that can be said of any impost.

FRANCE AND EGYPT.

THE communiqué to the Temps on the subject of the French veto on the conversion of the Egyptian debt will have surprised no well-informed person, at least as a "feeler." The position of the French as dogs in this particular manger has from the first been a scandal; it had for some time become a very uncomfortable scandal to the dogs themselves, and the discomfort naturally grew almost intolerable when Russia (who, having no interest in the matter, had been expected to give, and for some time had given, a kind of cheap and lukewarm support to the conduct of France) was understood to feel her own participation in this new kind of spoiling the Egyptians to be at once too thankless and too discreditable to be persisted in. Moreover, M. SPULLER may not improbably have reflected that to pile up surpluses for the hated English to dispose of, and to identify French policy with taxation, was a dubious way of ingratiating France with the Egyptians. There is, perhaps, no way in which the savings which the excellent management of Egyptian interests by England have brought about can be invested more profitably than in the reduction of the debt. But there are other ways which might be even more immediately popular in Egypt itself. Therefore it is cautiously hinted that France under certain circumstances may perhaps be graciously pleased to allow the Egyptians to use their own money in paying off their own debts.

The certain circumstances require, of course, careful consideration. The original proposal practically, if not totidem verbis, made the consent of France dependent on the evacuation of Egypt by the English. This "hault courage," which was such a halting courage seven years ago, appears now to have again reduced itself. The demand is now that England shall do something to show that she means to go some day; while a further hint is given in roundabout language that the part of pledge in this new variety of confidence trick might be played by a further reduction of the English garrison, their places being supplied by an increase of the Egyptian army, for which increase the sum saved by the conversion of the debt would supply funds. Now it would be quite unworthy of England to allow any kind of self-love or any kind of mischievous pleasure in the somewhat humiliating position wherein France has placed herself to interfere with English acceptance of any sign of French repentance. We, at any rate, put the true interests of the Egyptians before everything else in the matter—a proceeding which luckily does not prevent us from also considering our own—and we are, before all things, anxious to get the millstone of debt (paying an extravagant interest, quite out of all proportion to the credit of the country while that country is under our control) off Egyptian necks. If, moreover, as is rumoured, the demand for a mark of good faith is moderately put, it would be equally unnecessary to resent it as uncivil. Nor has any Englishman the least desire to keep English soldiers in Egypt longer than he can help, while some Englishmen (among whom we rank ourselves) believe that the Egyptian army might be strengthened with great advantage, so as to fit it for the task which must fall upon it sooner or later, the task of recovering the Upper Nile. So a quite delightful harmony may reign to a certain extent between Englishmen and Frenchmen on this subject. At the same time, it is not clear what satisfaction even that wonderful national vanity which rose to sputtering point the other day because the PRINCE OF WALES took part in a Cairo review can receive so long as there are any English soldiers left. It may be that the demand is merely made to "put a face on" the concession, and to enable French Ministers to console this same vanity by pointing out that they have quid pro quo. If this be all, let the French demand be granted by all means. But there are, unfortunately, two reasons against granting it in any sense that would expose Egypt to danger. First of all, there is little doubt that new and much more formidable Dervish attacks are threatened; and, though the Egyptians fought very well at Toski with a stiffening of European troops, there are probably few French officers who, in the Palace of Truth, would consent to take command of them without such a stiffening. Secondly, in regard to the actual matter, it is no use taking measures to improve Egyptian credit and at the same time taking measures to impair it. And it is quite certain that, if the English occupation of Egypt were known to be within even measurable distance of its end, the quotations of "Egyptians" on all the Bourses of Europe would fall most grievously, and would not soon recover. As for the question of French good will or ill will to England which has been imported into the matter in some discussions of it, the opinion of men who are well enough informed to know and sufficiently honest to speak their minds is practically unanimous on that head. There have been several times when French dislike of England was more vocal and demonstrative than at present; there have been very few times, indeed, when it was more widespread or more deeply seated.

PRIZE BLACKGUARDISM.

IT is a great pity, for a variety of reasons, that WILLIAM HAZLITT has not come to life again of late years. At present our reason for thinking what we have often thought at spare moments is that he might possibly be induced to give us an account of the so-called prize-fight near Bruges to stand by the side of the account of the fight which took place "a mile to the left of Hungerford on a gentle eminence." We should then have a description of the fight at its best and at its lowest possible point of degradation. The fight between the gasmen and BILL NEATE was not a refined spectacle, but, at least, it was a fair battle. The so-called prize-fight at Bruges was a cowardly, blackguard, vulgar business from first to last. Lord MACAULAY has observed with great judgment that the necessity of taking precautions to avoid legal punishment, and of secretly doing even things not necessarily degrading in themselves, has a very bad moral effect on those who do them. Even the admirers of past times (a class of thinkers of whom we desire to speak with all respect) must allow that the truth of this observation is admirably proved by the rascally scramble which took place between SLAVIN and SMITH. The prize-fight may have been a rather admirable thing in the days when it was not interfered with by the law. Even then, to be sure, it began early to become a very rowdy business. Fights were crossed, and roughs broke into the ring, long before the last battle between SAYERS and HEENAN. Still there was a sort of case for the old P. R. For the present one there is no sort of case at all. Fights have to be arranged in the back rooms of low taverns, and have to be fought out by stealth in holes and corners. As a matter of course, they fall entirely under the control of such persons as are to be found in low tap-rooms, and who do not shrink from slinking under cover in order to be able to break the law in safety.

That is the precise state of the facts concerning the so-called prize-fight at Bruges. We are aware that among the persons who put up at the Hôtel de l'Univers with SLAVIN, and at the Hôtel de Londres with SMITH, there were noble lords and gentlemen honourable by title or in theory. None the less, as these lords and gentlemen have chosen to associate themselves with roughs of the lowest sort, they must be content to be judged by their associates—for this occasion, at any rate. If Lord TOMNODDY and the Honourable Mr. VERISOPHT choose to be found in hotels or in the club-train from Dover with unwashed blackguardism which has been engaged in precisely the same way as themselves, they must make their mind up to be defiled with the dirt they are content to live with. It is a fact, too, that the conduct of these patrons of the noble art does remarkably little to justify the contention that a taste for witnessing boxing-matches has a tendency to develop a manly courage. SLAVIN has recorded, by the help of the friendly reporter, that two noble lords were so disgusted with the conduct of SMITH's following of roughs that they took his colours off their noble coats. It does not seem, however, that either these high-minded noblemen or any of the gallant gentlemen present did anything to keep the roughs in order. It was not they who saved SLAVIN from the ugly rush made at him by the scum who had crossed the fight. It is unnecessary to repeat the incidents of a business which has doubtless been studied by more readers and with more attention than anything else reported in the press this week. Besides, the meaning of the whole thing is too perfectly clear. The roughs who followed SMITH, who collected in his corner, and who assaulted SLAVIN, were intent on making money, or, if they could not do that, on so crossing the fight as to force the referee to declare the fight a draw. The referee, in terror for something or another—he said it was for SLAVIN—was induced to do what his blackguard fellow-sportsmen wished. That is the whole history of the fight, and that is what the P. R. has come to. It is time that it was brought to an end. We really cannot see how any difficulty should be found in ending it. This bolt abroad is a subterfuge which the law ought to find, and, if properly used, would find, no difficulty whatever in defeating. If it is illegal to hold a prize-fight, it is illegal to make arrangements to hold one. The persons, whoever they are—referee, backers, seconds, noble patrons, and the rest of it—who got up this mean scandal ought to be well hauled over the coals. If that is not done yet, all those who have any opportunity of commenting on the affair should make it perfectly plain to these persons that the real character of what they are doing is not hidden by their cant about sport, and so forth. It is, of course, useless to appeal to the roughs who crowded in SMITH's corner. Lord TOMNODDY, however, and the other noble patrons may, perhaps, not be indifferent to the discovery that what they have been doing is not only illegal—for which, possibly, they do not greatly care—but very low, cowardly, and dirty indeed. There is no sport and nothing manly about it. It is all a slinking hole-and-corner money speculation of fellows who are about the level of the thimblerrigger of the racecourse. If this knowledge has no effect upon them, that is only an extra reason why sharper methods should be tried.

PULPIT CHRISTMAS CARDS.

A NEW Departure by Dr. PARKER is a pleasant sub-heading to a newspaper paragraph during the festive season, though there is, of course, a sense in which it contains the germs of disappointment. Following, however, upon the larger-typed legend, "Pulpit Christmas Cards," we see at once the direction in which this eminent man has been "newly departing," and we humbly thank Providence for having reserved to our age a divine who has done so much to bring down religion, as SOCRATES did philosophy, to dwell among men, and especially men that are bill-stickers. The City Temple, we read, was crowded on Christmas morning when Dr. PARKER preached an eloquent sermon from the words "his star" (Matt. ii. 2), and at the close of his discourse sent a series of messages from his pulpit, addressed respectively to the Sovereign, to the Dean of PETERBOROUGH, to Mr. GLADSTONE, to Mr. BALFOUR, to Mr. PARNELL, to "Ecclesiastical Scotland," to "religious editors," and to "his" (Dr. PARKER's) "brother ministers." Each of these messages is interesting as containing an indication of Dr. PARKER's views upon subjects which do not arise directly out of Matt. ii. 2, and on which, therefore, his congregation might otherwise have gone away uninformed. For instance, the preacher, after invoking the Divine blessing on HER MAJESTY, asks, "Why do you not recognize your Nonconformist subjects, and openly express your opinion that their long-continued and splendid service entitles them to every recognition due to sound conviction, heroic fortitude, and patriotism which has survived the bitterest religious persecution?" Why, in other words, does not your MAJESTY give your faithful Dr. PARKER and his Nonconformist friends an advertisement gratis? We trust that it will occur to nobody to suggest the reply that the long-continued and splendid services of Dr. PARKER and his Nonconformist friends seem at present to be so well assured of having their claims to recognition kept modestly before the world that it hardly seems worth the while of the Sovereign to assist. Even under a Republic we can imagine this work continuing to be punctually performed—at any rate during Dr. PARKER's lifetime.

It will be gratifying, no doubt, to the Dean of PETERBOROUGH to learn that "his glorious deliverance on the subject of Church unity" has filled the minister of the City Temple, not only with delight, but with a "holy delight" (a pleonastic adjective, since the delight of a holy man must always, we presume, be a holy delight); while Mr. GLADSTONE will have abundant food for reflection in the compliment that "his character is greater even than his genius." But if Dr. PARKER had wanted to send Mr. GLADSTONE a really handsome Christmas card, he should have added that even the statesman's genius does not increase at a greater rate with advancing years than does his character. To Mr. BALFOUR the preacher addressed the pious wish "The good LORD have mercy upon you!" but added that, "personally and academically, I am proud of you." We are glad, of course, to hear that, both in his own person and in the character of an academy, Dr. PARKER is proud of the CHIEF SECRETARY, and we can excuse him for "hating Mr. BALFOUR's Irish policy with his whole heart," as "resentful, narrow, sceptical, and self-defeating." Religious editors are thanked for "the most generous service man ever rendered to man, but are warned to beware lest in unguarded moments ye bite and devour one another." We shrink from suggesting the obvious precaution against this strange propensity of the religious editor, and will content ourselves with referring to the Order in Council of last June. The card to "brother ministers" contains, however, the gem of the collection. "How magnificently," says Dr. PARKER, "the press and the pulpit might co-operate!" He does not say which particular columns of the press he refers to; but as regards one portion of the newspaper sheet the co-operation is magnificent already. But to hear Dr. PARKER suggesting it as a new idea! That beats everything. "Our tale is done, there is no more to say."

THE BANSTEAD COMMONS CASE.

LAST Saturday the Court of Appeal delivered a judgment which will hold by no means the least important place in the series of modern decisions on rights of common. The Banstead case will not be a landmark of the first magnitude, like the Epping Forest case; there cannot be another such decisive battle again, not even if some day there should be a battle royal between the Duchy of Cornwall and one or more of the great landowners who hold the "Commons of Devon" adjacent to Dartmoor. Great victories of principle are gained once for all. But much may long remain to be done for consolidating and assuring the fruits of victory; and it is on an achievement of this kind that the commoners of Banstead are to be congratulated. Some twenty-five years ago those who cared for the preservation of open spaces in the neighbourhood of London and other great towns began what then seemed an arduous and doubtful fight to reverse the bias impressed on our judiciary law by three centuries of dogmatism, and on our legislation by a century of benevolent (and for a time really beneficent) economics. Rights of common were archaic, scattered, and obscure. They were an abomination to the modern scientific farmer, and foolishness to the modern practical lawyer; they were in the hands of the ignorant and the weak, and in constant danger of being defeated and extinguished in detail. Yet the cause found undaunted champions against all these odds, and when it came to the proof of legal argument and decisions, the commoners prevailed all along the line. Their successes were many and brilliant—in the case of Epping Forest complete and crowning beyond all expectation—and their failures insignificant. From Plumstead to Epping, from Epping to Berkhamstead, from Berkhamstead to Banstead, London is girdled with trophies of the Commons Preservation movement. The Courts have quietly corrected their former bias, and Parliament has openly reversed the policy of the Inclosure Acts. It goes without saying that the main purpose of the movement was and is quite different from any purpose for which rights of common originally existed, or were supposed to exist by any one down to recent times. There is nothing whatever to conceal or extenuate about this. Many, perhaps most, of the things worth preserving in England which we still have with us have been preserved by some such happy accident of old means being available for novel ends.

Nowadays, then, the quest of commoners' rights is a pursuit rather than a battle. In this Banstead case the party of encroachment has made a sort of retreating stand, and has been signally defeated. It has always been allowed that, where and so long as rights of common existed, it was the duty of the lord, even with the right of inclosure or "approvement" conferred by the Statute of Merton, to leave sufficient pasture for the commoners. But it was a moot point how the sufficiency of common should be ascertained. This point has now presented itself for decision, and been taken up to the Court of Appeal. It was contended on the lord's behalf that a commoner is entitled only to so much pasture as is enough for the average number of sheep actually put on the common from his holding in modern times. On the other hand, the owners of tenements entitled to common contended that the question was not how many sheep a given tenement actually maintained in a given year, or an average of years, but how many it was capable of maintaining during the winter and turning out in the summer. Mr. Justice STIRLING and the Court of Appeal have held that the latter view is the right one, and that the test of sufficient common must be the same whether it is applied as between the lord and any individual commoner in respect of his particular holding, or as between the lord and the whole body of commoners in their collective interest. The right of common belongs to the land, not to the variable number of sheep which the tenant happens to keep on the land from time to time. Both on principle and on the weight of authority this is declared to be the law; and whatever is inconsistent with it in one or two modern decisions is overruled.

An especially tempting way of resisting the exercise of ancient rights of common, or concocting evidence against them, is thus removed. It can no longer be objected with any plausibility that the right of an existing owner is cut short because he, or some of his predecessors, did not use it to the full extent. Minor deductions from the principle may yet require to be judicially worked out, but the principle is established, unless, indeed, the House of Lords shall be of a different opinion; but this, we conceive, is not likely, for a few years ago the House actually invented, in the case of certain oysters at Saltash, a new method of claiming quasi-public rights. In the present case it was only necessary to reaffirm the oldest and best authorities on the subject. The Court of Appeal has done herein a thoroughly good piece of work.

THE AFFRAY AT YAKOUTSK.

THE fuller details just received of the terrible affray between Russian soldiers and Siberian exiles at Yakoutsch appears to afford substantial confirmation of the almost incredible story first published some weeks ago. Allowance ought, no doubt, still to be made for a certain amount of exaggeration. The suggestion, for instance, that the incident was planned on the part of the authorities is probably unfounded. That the soldiers had their guns already loaded, cartridges having been served out to them the previous evening, in itself proves little or nothing, and the statement that they had been previously informed that "they would have to fire upon the exiles" is possibly only the distorted version of a warning given to them that such an emergency might conceivably arise. The probability is that the attitude of the exiles was regarded with apprehension by the authorities, and that both parties were in that mood in which a sudden access of panic on either side might easily precipitate such a catastrophe as actually occurred. The situation was in itself one of a wholly exceptional kind; for it is only in Siberia that a guard of soldiers and police could be found in charge of a body of some thirty prisoners armed with revolvers. The theory that the affray arose out of a wilful misunderstanding on the part of the former is scarcely tenable. It is at least equally probable that the soldiers interpreted the refusal of the exiles, however innocent it may have been in intent, as an overt act of mutiny; that their acts of violence—the striking of the prisoners with the butts of their rifles, and so forth—were intended to overawe the mutineers; that the shots thereupon fired "again and again"—from which side it is not stated—may have been, some of them at any rate, revolver shots; and that, when matters reached this stage, panic broke out. Even from their own account it is clear that the prisoners did not tamely submit to attack. Some of them, at all events, seem to have used their revolvers freely; and the impression—deplorable enough, if less dreadful than the first account suggested—which we gather from the whole affair is, that both the prisoners and the custodians were possessed with the panic-born idea that each was executing a deliberately concocted plan of attack upon the other.

Far worse, to our thinking, than the affray itself—a misadventure which, however fatal its consequences, might have occurred anywhere—is the cold-blooded official barbarity of its sequel. This is purely Russian in character, and could have happened nowhere save in a country where men are condemned to a punishment almost worse than death by "administrative order," and where judicial investigation is the merest phrase. It is impossible to regard the court-martial held on this case as anything but a purely formal preliminary to the infliction of punishments already determined on. We lay no particular stress on its procedure, which was of a well-known order—the trial being held in private, and the prisoners being neither allowed the benefit of counsel nor permitted to see copies of the indictment against them. All this is in the regular Russian way; but, even with these precautions against enabling the accused to get a fair hearing for their own account of matters, we find it difficult to believe that the authorities could have failed to get at the real truth; and if, therefore, as seems by far the most probable hypothesis, the collision between the exiles and the soldiers was the mere accidental product of panic, we can hardly doubt but that that fact must have come out quite clearly in the course even of a one-sided investigation. The fact that only one policeman was killed (who, moreover, protested before dying his belief that he had been accidentally shot by the soldiers), while six of the prisoners were left dead, and nine others were more or less seriously wounded, is in itself pretty clear evidence that there was at least no premeditated attack on the guards. Thirty men firing revolvers at a preconcerted signal would assuredly give a better account of their adversaries than that. There seems, in short, to be no possibility of escaping the conclusion that the shockingly severe sentences passed on the surviving exiles were simply inflicted in order to put a good face on a police blunder. Authority in Siberia could not afford to admit that a mistake had been made. It might have been more than Governor OSTASHENE's place was worth to have done so. And so three more had to be condemned to death—one of them so badly wounded that his bed had to serve him, so to speak, for a "drop"—and some fifteen others sentenced to long terms of imprisonment, in order to make matters straight.

THE YEAR.

1889 HAS had a history which may either be told at great length or cut very short. It has consisted, for the most part, of small things which may be the beginnings of others of great importance, but were not of very striking interest in themselves. In America one government has disappeared, for a time certainly, and not improbably for ever; but in the rest of the world nations stand much where they did, their relative power unchanged, and their rivalries neither pacified nor advanced towards settlement. For this country the year has been, on the whole, one of prosperity and, in politics, of small useful things. The strikes, which have been numerous in the last six months, may be said to form an exception. They may check the revival of prosperity and turn out to have had important political consequences. As yet, however, they have not visibly delayed the improvement in trade, and their political influence is still problematical. On a survey of the whole year, nothing will be seen to have excited such general or intense interest as a debate which raged during a time in summer on the question whether a lady, who probably administered arsenic to her sickly husband, killed him therewith if she did give it. Next in popular estimation to this was the very theatrical discovery that a person who had long been an active Irish Nationalist and patriot had, in pursuit of a quarrel with other Nationalists and patriots, foisted on the Times newspaper forgeries which he meant to have a ruinous effect on his former associates. The Maybrick case and the detection, followed by the suicide, of Mr. Pigott have been certainly the most important, but quite as certainly the most noisy, of the events of the year.

Our domestic political history has consisted mainly of speeches, in which leaders of all parties (we can no longer, as we once could, say both) have recapitulated the arguments for their own sides—or have indicated what they believe will be the course which will lead to victory. The Unionist alliance has remained unbroken, and has borne fruit in useful legislation, and the even more useful steady application of the law in Ireland. On this side the speakers have had a definite policy, an absolutely clear and intelligible position to defend. The Opposition has been less fortunate. It has, by its own confession, no policy—unless it be one to assert that the present Ministry must be upset in order to make room for another of uncertain constitution, which will do something indefinite in Ireland as a preliminary to other things elsewhere. This proposition it has, indeed, reasserted in season and out of season, with what effect on the constituencies it is impossible to say while we stand so far from a general election which may be fought on as yet unforeseen issues. It is impossible to tell the history of such a conflict as this, or do more than roughly estimate its results up to the present. On the whole, it seems most credible that the Unionist alliance remains where it did, and that the Opposition is in a process of ferment. What the things to be done after the settlement of Ireland are, whether some of them ought not to be promoted to a front place, who ought to do them, and what will happen when the Separatists can no longer secure an appearance of coherence by standing with their hopes and rivalries in their pockets behind Mr. Gladstone, these are the real political questions of the day as far as the Opposition is concerned; but they obviously do not depend on matters of fact, which are material for narrative, but on deduction from speeches or personal character which is material for argument and demonstration.

The existence of this ferment in the Opposition side may be confidently deduced from the history of the Session. A few sentences can give the net result of the Ministry's labours between the 21st of February, when Parliament met, and the 31st of August, when it broke up. Lord George Hamilton carried through his Naval Defence Bill in the earlier portion of the Session. The measure was almost ludicrously small, when compared with what naval critics had for months been declaring to be absolutely necessary. And yet it was received by naval authorities as a good and sufficient measure. It was far larger than the dwindling remnant of the Manchester school or the garrulous fanatics of the new Peace party, which caricatures Mr. Cobden's follies, thought tolerable—but from them there was no formidable opposition to be feared. The regular Opposition was in a difficulty. Additions to the navy had always been popular, and in this case there was a practically universal belief that they were exceptionally necessary. The Opposition could not therefore attack the object of the Bill. It was consequently driven to criticize its form. Lord George Hamilton asked Parliament to vote 21,500,000*l.*, to be spent on building or repairing ships and in providing guns, during a term of seven years. A great effort was made to simulate a belief that a subtle attempt lay concealed in this to limit the power of the House of Commons, and there was a great show of desire to defend our ancient Constitution. But the House was not to be persuaded that it was in danger of chains, and the country displayed the most absolute indifference to the risk that the power of a majority to cut down the defences from popularity-hunting motives should be diminished. There was even a pretty general expression of opinion that any diminution of that power would be an excellent thing. The opposition to the Bill was therefore necessarily hollow, and it passed unaltered. The Scotch Local Government and University Bills passed in the midst of the Session, not quickly, but easily, and almost unperceived. The first gave Scotland the benefit of County Councils adjusted to Scotch conditions, and organized according to Scotch ideas. The second provided a machinery for the government of Scotch Universities, such as Scotchmen have persuaded themselves is necessary. Looked at as part of the general history of the year, the course of these Bills is mainly valuable for the evidence it affords of the entire superfluity of a local Parliament for purposes of business. If the Scotch had discussed them in a legislative assembly of their own, they could not have had the handling of them to themselves more entirely. Nobody supposed that Scotchmen would do other than treat business as business, and do their best for their country's affairs. They were, therefore, left to attend to them themselves; and it cannot be said that the general interest of the nation suffered in any way. The conclusion that when Irishmen will look upon Irish affairs as business, and not as weapons to be used against the Union, they also will be left to deal with them alone is easy to draw.

Naval defence and Scotch business gave the Opposition little chance. Its opportunity, however, came in July, when the Royal Grants Bill was introduced. In July Mr. Smith had to ask the Commons to provide a dowry for the Princess Louise of Wales on her marriage to the Duke of Fife. The Ministry combined with this a request for the means to provide the eldest son of the Prince with an establishment. This motion immediately aroused the Opposition, and gave Mr. Labouchere an opportunity of showing that the Radical party within the Separatist party, which he had organized at the beginning of the Session, was not a mere figure of speech. As the Ministry was anxious that Parliamentary resistance to the grant should be as little discreditable to the House as the Opposition would permit, it made a concession which it might well have refused to make. It appointed a Committee to examine into the whole question of the Royal Grants, and undertook to stand by its finding. If the Ministry had had to deal with Mr. Gladstone only, it is probable that this would have been enough, and that the grant would have met no further opposition, except from the handful of members who think that Liberal principles and rudeness to the Queen are convertible terms. But the result showed that whoever deals with the Separatist party has to deal with much more than Mr. Gladstone now. He, indeed, did not hamper the Ministry, but accepted the Committee and submitted to its decisions. The Radicals, under Mr. Labouchere's guidance, took a very different course. They endeavoured to foist into the reference to the Committee an order to make an inquisitorial examination of the Queen's private affairs; then they made an attack on the composition of the Committee; then they resisted its recommendation, which was that a sum of 34,000*l.*—reduced, for no very obvious reason, from 40,000*l.*—should be made to the Prince of Wales for the establishment of his family. This course was taken independently of, or in opposition to, Mr. Gladstone, who supported the Ministry. It none the less secured the approval of, on various occasions, from 116 to 134 members of the Separatist party, who must be held to have shown a distinct inclination to act independently of their revered leader. During the last stage of the Grants Bill a further division took place in the party. Mr. Labouchere and Mr. Morley both decided to oppose the recognition by the House of Commons of the Queen's right to demand grants for her grandchildren; but they could not decide to do so together. First Mr. Labouchere did it, and Mr. Morley did not vote for him, on the 26th of July. Then Mr. Morley did it, and Mr. Labouchere's party did vote for him, on the 29th of July. The difference in numbers of the minority on these occasions was exactly 17 in favour of Mr. Morley. In all these things the part of Sir W. V. Harcourt was not remarkable. But he also had an opportunity later on. At the very close of the Session the Ministry decided on a step which, if abstract right and legal claims were all that a Ministry were bound to consider, would have been more than justified. It resolved to pass a Bill to enable the clergy of the Established Church in Wales to recover their tithes in the County Courts. But a Ministry has other things to consider, and among them are the determination of Liberals to make the utmost use they can of sectarian hatred of the Church of England, and the belief of some members of the Church that they can in some mysterious way serve its cause by showing an amazingly tender regard for its implacable enemies. Between the two an opposition was organized against the Bill, which first compelled the Ministry to modify it, and then to give it up. In these transactions Sir William Harcourt was very conspicuous. The end of the Session, therefore, if it left the alliance between the Conservatives and the Liberal-Unionists where it found it, most undoubtedly left the power of Mr. Gladstone over his own party shaken, and showed that there were three possible candidates for his succession.

The direct share which Irish affairs had in the business of the Session was not considerable. Compared with what it has had in recent years, that share was insignificant indeed. A few industrial Bills were carried after an opposition which came mainly from a section of the English Radicals. Of what are commonly understood by Irish debates there were very few. As a matter of course, the whole relation of Ireland to the Union was gone over in the course of the debate on the Address. Almost as a matter of course, too, Mr. O'Brien and kindred spirits succeeded in so far persuading the House of Commons that their personal comfort is a matter of importance as to secure a whole debate to themselves on the outrageous conduct of the police which first arrests them and then will not allow them to be rescued. The most Irish demonstration which diversified the Session arose out of proceedings before the Special Commission. It would obviously be impossible to give here an account of the proceedings themselves. In the first place, they are in mere point of length more bulky than the evidence collected about the Irish massacre of 1641. In the second place, they are not yet finished. The Commission have heard the evidence and the advocates. They have yet, however, to give their finding. Still, it would be an affectation to treat the most notorious of the incidents of the inquiry as a matter which lies beyond the reach of their comment. The events of what may be called the Pigott week stand apart from the rest of the history of the Commission. The story which was unfolded before the Commission between the 16th and the 23rd February was indeed a remarkable one, and it led to proceedings only less remarkable than itself. Under the strain of a cross-examination which hardly needed to be skilful in order to be effective, it was discovered that this person had for once in his life told the strict truth when he said that his evidence would damage the side which called him as a witness. He was soon forced to confess, what indeed had long been no secret, that he was one of the most disreputable of mankind; that he had been a dishonest adventurer while he was still a Nationalist editor, and that he had become a forger when he supplied the Times with what purported to be damaging letters written by Mr. Parnell and others. The cross-examination of Pigott left no doubt whatever that the actual documents handed to the Times were the fruit of Mr. Pigott's imagination, if not his memory, and that the newspaper had no guarantee for them except the forger's word. This discovery had hardly been made before Mr. Pigott, under the influence apparently of the common delusion that there is no extradition treaty with Spain, fled to that country, and on learning that it was a delusion, shot himself in an hotel in Madrid. On the eve of his departure, Mr. Labouchere showed so much confidence in his honesty as to accept a confession from him. It was only natural that the Parnellite party should make the most of the fraud perpetrated on the Times by this countryman and ex-ally of their own. They endeavoured, and their English friends endeavoured with them, to represent that the whole reference to the Special Commission had broken down with the Times' letters, and an opportunity of stating that theory in the House of Commons was provided in the shape of an attack on Sir Richard Webster, the Attorney-General, for his professional conduct of the case. Sir Richard Webster vindicated himself in the House of Commons on the 22nd March, and his vindication was subsequently endorsed by the most competent of all judges—both branches of the legal profession. In the country Separatist speakers continued for some time to assert on every available occasion that with the discovery of the Pigott forgeries the whole case against the Nationalist members had broken down. But the inquiry went on, and in the face of what it revealed these assertions gradually died down. Mr. Parnell did at last withdraw from before the Commission with the intention, as he avowed, of showing that he had ceased to be interested in the inquiry. But the withdrawal did not convince the country that this contention was well founded. Others are to judge when the defendant ceases to be interested in legal proceedings, and in this case the competent authority has yet to decide.

Ireland itself has been in the condition it usually is in under an Administration resolved to enforce the law—in a state of quiet, varied by sporadic outbreaks of crime. The murder of Inspector Martin at Gweedore on the 3rd of February, while serving a warrant on Father McFadden, was a characteristic incident of Irish agitation. It was characteristic, too, that it should have been quoted during the debate on the Address in the House of Commons as one of the many offences of a Government which does not save its officers from violence by habitual surrender to opposition. In this case, however, direct responsibility was brought home to the persons who were betrayed by the prospect of immunity into the error of beating a policeman to death. In October the Government added to the offence of not providing an overwhelming force to execute its orders by securing convictions, on confession, for manslaughter against fifteen of the poor men whom it did not overcome soon enough for their good. At the same time, Father McFadden, who had remained indoors while the mob was cudgelling Inspector Martin to death on his doorstep, was sent to prison for resisting arrest. The Gweedore crime and its consequences are the type of what has been happening all through Ireland throughout the year. The Government has not always been able to secure immediate obedience to the law; but it has not allowed resistance to be ultimately successful. In no case has the Plan of Campaign been carried through, and in some it has distinctly failed. A recognition, if not of the victory of the Government, at least of the inability of the old organizations to defeat it, was given by the formation in July of a new 'Tenants' League. This body has not as yet done more than impose a tax on the patriot rank and file for the benefit of the patriot staff. How far this source of revenue will make good the painful deficiency of supplies from the United States—which have discovered by the help of Dr. Cronin that Irish methods emigrate with the Irish—remains to be seen. The resolution of the Government has been further recognized by a notable diminution of activity on the part of the English Separatists on Irish soil. None of them have shown the slightest desire to share the imprisonment of Mr. Conybeare, and its disagreeable though exceptional incidents. So low has the level of English Separatist activity on Irish soil sunk that even Mr. Shaw Lefevre has been recognized as a comparatively dangerous man.

Since the middle of August the Irish and other questions have been much obscured in England by the more immediate importance of the strikes, which began in that month, and have gone on, by a process of descent, from one trade to another to the end of the year. It is not as yet possible to estimate the exact nature and the importance of these movements. A strike may obviously be more than a pure trade dispute. It may be an attempt on the part of the workmen to carry out political and social ideas preached to them by some of their leaders. Under which head the strikes of the last five months are to be ranked we cannot as yet say with certainty. An approximately accurate estimate of their character can only be hoped for by careful discrimination between them. The strikes have been numerous—indeed almost universal—and a very large proportion of them have been trade disputes, pure and simple—attempts to secure better pay or shorter hours. These are the natural consequences of the improvement in trade, of the desire of the men to share in that improvement, and the by no means intelligent reluctance of the employers to grant cheerfully and at once what experience should have taught them they must, under prevailing conditions of trade, ultimately concede. The history of such disputes would be a twenty-times-told tale. But one series of the strikes—nearly all confined to London—has had a distinct character of its own. The line began with the Dockers' strike in August, and has gone on to the Gas-workers' strike of December. In these cases there has been either an attempt to extort increase of pay from "Capital," by the combined action of "Labour"—many trades joining to back up one—or an attempt to impose conditions of work on employers where no dispute as to pay or hours of work existed. These movements, too, have met with no small amount of effusive, but not less effectual, sympathy from active knots of whole or half politicians.

The Dockers' strike had the appearance when it started of being a mere trade dispute. Whether it was more than an appearance was very doubtful; for no sooner had the movement begun than an organization was found ready to turn it into something very different, and it may be supposed without rashness that that which profited so promptly by the strike had helped to produce it. If the movement was the beginning of the execution of a settled scheme, it is not to be denied that the choice of a starting-point was made with judgment. The Dockers were notoriously a miserably paid body of casual labourers, afflicted by all the miseries and defects commonly found in men whose work and pay are alike small and irregular. When it was heard that they had struck for a penny more an hour and more fixity of engagements, there was a general feeling that they were making a reasonable demand. The unwillingness of the Dock Directors to make concessions was thought somewhat harsh, and their plea that the capital invested in the Docks did not make a return which justified an increase of expenses was held to be discredited by the fact that much of this capital had been invested in an unbusinesslike manner, and ought properly to be considered lost. The strike, therefore, started in the midst of real, though not at first active, sympathy with the Dockers and a marked absence of sympathy with the Dock Companies. These last naturally, however, sympathized with themselves, and did their best to make a fight. Under ordinary circumstances the struggle would have gone on to the usual end of surrender or compromise. But the circumstances soon became other than ordinary. A strike committee, of which the character could be judged by the presence on it of well-known Socialists, was formed, if it was not anterior to the strike. The men grew angry. Picketing was carried to the length of intimidation. Mr. Matthews declared in the House of Commons that there was no proof of the existence of "organized intimidation." What degree of threatening and violence the Home Secretary considered would amount to this he did not explain, but unofficial people were of opinion that when noisy mobs beset dock gates and railway stations, when workmen who had accepted the Company's terms were attacked and beaten, there was both organization and intimidation. Very soon the strike was complicated by something much newer than this not uncommon feature of such movements. In September, London was introduced for the first time to what was called a strike out of sympathy. Great numbers of other workmen, some engaged on the river, others not, went on strike, not, as they asserted, to gain anything for themselves, but by hampering the industry of London to put pressure on the Dock Directors, and bring public opinion to bear to make them yield. The fact that the weather was fine and work everywhere relaxed by the holiday season, novelty, and the mere influence of fashion had undoubtedly all some share in forwarding this demonstration. But there were other causes of a more serious nature which must be allowed for in estimating its character. The language used and the things done were proofs that what are called Socialistic ideas have spread widely among the working classes. The leaders talked and the men acted under the influence of an obvious belief that "labour" is in a natural state of antagonism to the rest of the community, and can extort whatever terms it pleases, without any fear that the loss it may inflict on others will recoil on itself. The words used were often in excess of the things done. An attempt, for instance, to bring about a "general strike," a complete stoppage of all work in London, met with instant failure. But the spirit which was inspiring many of the workmen was undeniable, and its existence is a fact of gravity. To a large extent the Socialist leaders of the Dock strike were encouraged by the active sympathy of persons not belonging in any way to their own class. The shipowners of London showed a very selfish disposition to make the most they could out of the difficulties of the Dock Companies. Some wharfingers kept them in countenance, and the alliance of Dock Labourers, Lightermen, Stevedores, and Coal-Porters was egged on by men of business who would not look beyond the immediate advantage to be obtained by compelling the Companies to surrender. The purely voluntary help given to the strike was also considerable. Money was freely contributed, principally from the Colonies. In London a so-called Committee of Conciliation, of which Cardinal Manning, the Lord Mayor, and Mr. Sydney Buxton were the best known members, was formed to promote a settlement. The Dock strikers' leaders were very busy with these gentlemen, and a great deal of negotiation, which, in fact, meant threatening direct and indirect, went on with the Directors. After a month of conflict a modified victory was gained by this combination of labour, Socialism, self-seeking, and emotional sympathy. A first compromise by which the Directors agreed to raise the pay of the Dockers and accept their stipulations as to terms of engagement after the 1st of January fell through. But, after another week of conflict, an agreement was come to on the understanding that the date for the rise in wages was to be the 4th of November. With this the Dockers' strike was held to have come to an end.

As might have been expected, the movement did not end here. The possession of funds, of a weapon which seemed irresistible, and the enjoyment of public sympathy, naturally induced the Dock Strike Committee to go on. In the docks themselves there were several weeks of uncertainty. The strikers, who had formed a Union, refused to work with the "blacklegs"—the men taken on during the strike—although they had bound themselves to do so by the terms of their agreement with the Directors. To a large extent they succeeded in either securing their expulsion or forcing them to come into the Union. It seemed repeatedly likely that the conflict would begin again. Although a general cessation of work was avoided, there were several minor quarrels. The lightermen—a privileged body defended by a charter—who had first struck out of sympathy, then struck for themselves. By the help of the same Committee of Conciliation they were able to extort astonishingly good terms. All the strikes were not equally successful. At Silvertown the employers defied coercion, and beat the strike completely, partly by removing a portion of their works to Paris. But the disposition to strike increased, and with its increase came growing activity on the part of those committees and "executives" of Unions which have the direction of these movements. They have been frequently at variance with one another, and have expressed their mutual dislike and distrust, not only by language of great violence, but by actual fisticuffs. Still, they have all been ready to act against the employer. The determination to make the Unions an independent power has at last culminated in a struggle, which is still going on. While the Dock strike was in progress, the South Metropolitan Gas Company introduced a system of agreement with its men by which a bonus or fixed share in the profits was to be given to those of the hands who would sign a contract to work for a year, a period which was afterwards reduced. At the time it was generally thought that this was equally politic for the Company and advantageous for the men. The Gas-Workers' Union saw in it an attack on themselves, and resolved to bring about a strike in order to force the Company, not only to rescind its agreement, but to dismiss the workmen who had signed it. The Company, encouraged by the success of resistance to similar dictation at Manchester and Salford, stood out. As it was, though not till after some appearance of reluctance, properly protected by the police, it was able to contend on equal terms with its assailants. No difficulty was found in securing men to replace the strikers; and the Union has, so far, been completely beaten. But the end has not come yet. In this case, too, we are still threatened with a strike from sympathy. The coal-porters threaten to stop the delivery of coal to the South Metropolitan Gas Company. What is still more serious, the gas-workers on the north side of the Thames have begun to talk of going out unless the South Metropolitan Company surrenders to the Union. Whatever the exact value of these threats may be as indications of what coal-porters and gas-workers can do, there can be no doubt of their importance as indications of the spirit which now largely prevails among the working-men. It is plain that those who talk in this way are prepared to appear absolutely reckless as to what damage they may inflict on the community.

The British colonies have not been wholly free from difficulties. Canada has still to complain that the Fishery Question is unsettled, and that her big neighbour is guilty of high-handed proceedings towards her. During the summer months a United States Revenue boat called the Rush made several captures of British Columbian sealing-vessels in Behring Straits. These captures were justified by an exceedingly disputable claim of sovereignty over the seas between Alaska and the eastern end of Siberia. But, though England has protested against what she maintains to be an unfounded pretension, she has not gone beyond protests; and they have, as a matter of course, produced no effect. The vessels taken have in all cases been brought back by the crews to English ports, as the American officer uniformly, and probably deliberately, omitted to put a sufficient force on board to hold them. The validity of the captures has, therefore, never been affirmed by an American Admiralty Court, and it is doubtful whether it would be. In its present state the dispute is a natural cause of irritation to Canada. There is no sign of a desire on the part of the United States Government to come to a settlement. Indeed, the Fishery Question is likely soon to become acute. The Administration of President Harrison has made no step towards a renewal of negotiations for a treaty; and, as the modus vivendi arranged by Mr. Chamberlain is running out, the countries will revert to the condition of things established in 1818, which has already repeatedly produced dissensions.

In Australia there has been a revival of the desire to effect a federation. Sir Henry Parkes, the Premier of New South Wales, has this time taken the lead. He declined to join the Premier of Victoria in an attempt to establish a purely military convention to enable the colonies to act together for their own defence, unless a common Administration for all of them was set up at the same time. As Federation is desired by the other colonies, his wish, though it has caused some surprise, is hardly in keeping with his policy of late years. The Australian colonies have, therefore, agreed to begin discussing how they are to turn their present limited Federal Council into something more closely resembling the Administration of the Dominion of Canada.

Our African possessions are those which may be most confidently relied on to compel attention. The power to do so is not weakened by the uncertainty of the border between our colonial and our foreign relations in that continent. With both we have had trouble, beginning with Cape Town in the south, which is undoubtedly a colony, and ending with Egypt in the north, which, though nominally a foreign country in which we have interests of a complicated kind, is fast becoming a possession. In Cape Colony the Governor, Sir Hercules Robinson, has found it impossible to continue in office in view of the fact that the Home Government would not agree with him that the natural destiny of every extension of British territory in South Africa is to come under the Cape. These extensions have been considerable. One great district on the mainland opposite Zanzibar, with a coast-line reaching from Vitu to Pemba, and an extension inland up to the Lake district, has been recognized as under British influence, and has been given to a Company organized on the model of the North Borneo Company. To the south the great stretch of country known as Matabele Land, which lies to the north of the Transvaal, has been put under a similar Company. In this region we have approached the renewal of an old conflict, and have come into sharp collision with one European rival who does us the honour to rely on our unwillingness to strike the weak. The English who have been attracted into the Transvaal are beginning to outnumber the Boers, and it seems not unlikely that there will be a conflict of races before long. Portugal in the meantime has openly advanced pretensions to put itself in our way. It has claimed to be sovereign over a belt of country stretching from its western possessions at Benguela to its eastern possessions at Mozambique. In Delagoa Bay—which it holds because England was weak enough to suppose that a foreign Government, called upon to act as arbitrator between it and Portugal, would decide fairly between a great Power, which had shown it would not resent partiality, and a little Power, which might be bribed to be useful—our old ally has confiscated a railway built by English capital. Finally, one of its officers has, unless he is greatly misrepresented, committed what is little short of an act of aggression. The activity of Mr. Consul Johnston has proved that the Shiré, which rises in Lake Nyassa and falls into the Zambesi, is navigable. It runs through a country occupied by English mission stations and opened by English explorers. As we have refused to recognize the right of Portugal to shut the Zambesi, it is obvious that this river opens to us a direct water-way to the Lake country. When this fact had been demonstrated by us its importance became clear to the Portuguese. They began to talk of reasserting vague claims to the Shiré Valley. A "scientific" expedition was at once organized under the well-known Portuguese explorer, Major Serpa Pinto, and that expedition has fired upon natives who had good reason to believe themselves under British protection. Whether that act will lead, as it should lead, to a thoroughgoing settlement of all claims in South-Eastern Africa, will depend on the firmness of Her Majesty's Ministers. As yet it has only led to an exchange of notes and a great deal of that fluent abuse of England which comes so naturally to most Continental journalists, and particularly to our good friends of France and our allies in the Peninsula.

from a position of supremacy from north to south in Eastern Africa. In Egypt itself the course of things has been, on the whole, favourable. English administration has been securing a tighter and tighter hold on the country, in spite of the fretful intriguing of France. When the organization of the country had advanced so far as to give some plausibility to the contention that England could now fulfil her conditional promise to retire, the Mahdi was good enough to send an army down the Nile under the well-known and generally successful Wad-el-N'jumi. In September, after not a little manœuvring, the Mahdi's commander was compelled to give battle at Toski. His army was easily routed and he himself killed. The Mahdist attack on Egypt was beaten back; but the fact that there had been an attack was sufficient answer to those who thought that England could leave the country to its own resources.

The fate which has overtaken a part of what was once an Egyptian dominion since it has been left to its own resources is too instructive. After the delays which were naturally caused by his deliberate choice of the longest and most difficult route—delays which, all must acknowledge, have enabled him to display the most creditable courage, tenacity, and managing faculty—Mr. Stanley has at last "relieved" Emin Pasha from his trying position at Wadelai. He has, that is to say, brought him out, not altogether to his liking, as it would seem. Emin Pasha is, therefore, safe, though a fall has laid him prostrate for a time. But the province of Wadelai has gone to the Mahdi, and Mr. Stanley has left the slave-hunter Tippoo Tib behind him in a position of command in the Congo State. The details of the story are hardly yet fully known, the principal authorities for the present being Mr. Stanley's necessarily fragmentary letters; but the result is painfully clear, and is precisely what we have stated—complete victory for the Mahdists in Wadelai and increased power for the slave-hunters in the Congo State. That in the course of last year and this Mr. Stanley struggled from the valley of the Congo by the Aruwihimi to the Albert Nyanza, leaving a camp behind him on the latter river, which came to a disastrous end with the loss of Major Barttelot and Mr. Jameson; that he crossed and recrossed forests; that he found Wadelai in a state of rebellion against Emin and the Mahdists advancing; that he persuaded the German and forced some of his followers to come away—these leading facts we know. They prove, as has been already said, that fanaticism and slave-hunting have made themselves masters of the Lake country of Africa, and will advance from thence unless kept back by superior power. The Mahdists have not only expelled the white man, but have defeated the Abyssinians and killed their king.

Abroad there has not been much of novelty or importance to note, except, as usual, in France. The revolution of last month in Brazil was so far of interest that it marked the introduction of the well-known South American anarchy into the one State of the continent which has hitherto been free from it. The garrison of Rio de Janeiro, which was discontented because it was not sufficiently consulted in political affairs, and also because it was threatened by an unwelcome change of quarters, revolted under a certain Marshal da Fonseca, and sent the Emperor Dom Pedro into exile with his family. No blow was struck; the garrison of the capital and the squadron did all the work. A provisional Government has been established, which has hitherto taken care to control the despatch of news to Europe. All we know is that a form of government which must have been singularly decrepid fell before a military revolt of the most commonplace character, and we can only wait to see whether anarchy will follow from events which are calculated to produce little else.

In Europe all the Great Powers, except France, have passed a tranquil year, on the whole. Russia has been perfectly quiet—undisturbed by the Nihilist murders or massacres of Jews, which alone diversify the affairs of a country in which government is in the hands of a very few, who render no public account of their stewardship. In Germany there have been strikes, which, however, led to no disorder. The Emperor has paid, and received, visits; he has at last entertained, among other guests, the Czar, whom he had called on before all his brother sovereigns. He has increased his army, and repeatedly declared his confidence that peace will endure. As much might be said of the sovereigns of Austria and Italy. The first of these rulers has been cruelly stricken by the sudden and violent death of his heir, the Archduke Rudolph, early in the year, and has had to contend both in Hungary and Bohemia with those explosions of local patriotism which rage every now and then, till the Emperor tells them to stop, and is at once obeyed. Questions of some difficulty which might have been started by the death of the King of Holland from the stroke of apoplexy which prostrated him have been postponed by his recovery.

The international relations of Europe have continued to be what they have been for years. There has been everywhere the same continuous assertion of a desire to maintain peace, the same avowed confidence in its continuance, and the same active preparation for the war which ought not to come if one half of this assertion and confidence is genuine. In '89 as in '86 and '87 Central Europe has been banded to resist the possible combination of East and West. Once during May the profound national hatred and distrust which underlies all this diplomatic profession was revealed for a moment. An unfounded report that the German Emperor and his guest, the King of Italy, were about to visit Strasburg together threw the French into a convulsion of rage, which was only appeased when they persuaded themselves that a design, which was only authenticated by rumour, had been given up. Because of the influence they might have in breaking the uneasy peace of the Continent the obscure troubles of South-Eastern Europe have been anxiously watched. In Servia King Milan, after straining the constitution in order to get rid of his wife, presided at the beginning of the year over the making of a new one. When it appeared that he had brought about a settlement to his liking, he surprised Europe by abdicating, with the proviso that if his wife was allowed to return, he would return too. The Queen has returned, and seated herself at the gates of the Regents appointed by the King, but Milan has not come back. How this ignoble wrangle affects the really serious struggle—the rivalry of Russia and Austria in Servia—is not clear. The Montenegrins, the paid dependents of Russia, are busy pushing into Servia, and will be ready, no doubt, when they are wanted. Bulgaria continues as before to be ruled by the resolute M. Stambouloff under the nominal authority of Prince Ferdinand. While that is the case there will be one Balkan State from which Russia has little to hope. The weakness and the vices of Turkish administration have borne their not uncommon fruits in Armenia and in Crete—the discontent of very badly governed subjects and the intrigues of adventurers. In Armenia the misconduct of the Kurds has, as of old, been great, and it has not been efficiently suppressed. In Crete there has been actual fighting—part of it rebellion, part faction fight. Here, also, the work of suppression has been but ill done by the Turks. Yet in neither case has the trouble led to what is meant to be the end of all troubles in Turkey, another attack on the integrity of the Sultan's dominions, another reopening of the Eastern Question.

A minor international question which made some noise in its day was ended in a fashion unprecedented in diplomatic history. The rivalries of England, Germany, and the United States in Samoa had brought ships of all three nations into the roadstead of Apia. Here they were attacked on the 15th March by a hurricane which utterly wrecked the German and American squadrons, while H.M.S. Calliope steamed out to sea in the teeth of the gale. By this wind the Samoan question was blown away and nothing more has been heard of it.

France, as ever, stands apart from neighbouring States in the interest of its internal affairs. This year they have even certain originality as compared with other passages in French politics, for a revolutionary movement has been beaten without actual fighting. In January, General Boulanger was returned for Paris against an advanced Republican by 245,236 votes to 162,875. This event, which took M. Floquet's Ministry entirely by surprise, showed the Parliamentary Republicans that they were in serious danger—and they recognized the fact. It is not to be denied that they acted with sense and vigour. They took France tightly in hand, and France, as usual, obeyed. M. Floquet's Ministry was upset. A new Cabinet was formed under M. Tirard, which possessed in M. Constans a Minister of the Interior who knew how elections should be conducted in France by a government in danger. The electoral law was modified, Scrutin d'arrondissement replaced by Scrutin de liste. A special Court was set up to try the General and his associates, MM. Rochefort and Dillon. The utmost was made of the fact that this is the centenary of the meeting of the States-General, and that a great exhibition which was relied on to bring money into France was to be opened in Paris. The result proved that the new Ministry had judged correctly what appeals to make, what measures to take. The General fled before his trial came on, first to Brussels, then to London. In his absence he was arraigned and condemned to imprisonment for life on the hardly concealed ground that he had attained to a popularity which made him dangerous. The Exhibition was a success. When in September the elections were held, it was found that good management and good luck had served the Parliamentary Republicans. The Exhibition, the undignified figure cut by the refugee General, and the unsparing rigour with which M. Constans used the whole power of the administration, combined to give them a majority of 151 in the new Chamber. Not much less than half the total votes given were given for the Oppositions of one colour or the other, but as they were distributed the majority of Republican members returned was great. The Boulangerists secured little more than forty seats. Such a victory is not certainly very glorious. The Republicans are far less powerful than they were when Marshal McMahon was overthrown, and their enemies are as strong as they were in the last Chamber. Yet they have at least won for the time, and if it has been by the use of methods familiar to the old arbitrary Governments of France, their continued victory is not less probable on that account.

The obituary of the year is long, and contains the names of three Englishmen of the first eminence. No one of his countrymen was ignorant that Mr. John Bright, who died in March, was not only the representative of a once powerful school of politicians, a popular leader who enjoyed and exerted in a thoroughly unselfish way an immense moral influence, but the greatest orator of his time. Dr. Lightfoot, Bishop of Durham, whose death occurred at the very end of the year, was equally beyond question the first of English theological scholars, and a very formidable defender of his faith. It would not be easy to state with equal precision the position of Mr. Robert Browning, who died at the close of the year a few days before the Bishop; but he certainly left behind him no equal in general intellectual vigour, and not more than one superior—if even one—in the mastery of English verse, when his admirable genius was allowed to act unhampered by his eccentricities. Of less famous men of letters a long list have died within the year. Mr. Albery, the playwright; Mr. Allingham, the poet; Mr. S. C. Hall, a veteran who had outlived three generations; Mr. Halliwell Philipps, the distinguished Shakspearian scholar, a respectable worker in a field in which pedantry and folly have been found to be exceptionally easy; Dr. Hueffer, a naturalized German, who was the best known of English musical critics; Mr. Ralston, who did more than any Englishman of his time to familiarize his countrymen with Russian literature; the Rev. J. G. Wood, the most widely read of the numerous body of popularizers of science; Dr. C. Mackay, journalist, miscellaneous author, and song-writer; the Rev. Horatius Bonar, the hymn writer—all these were men of very various qualities and merits, but all of mark. Mr. Martin Tupper stands by himself as one who had enjoyed and outlived a most amazing, but not by any means inexplicable, popularity. Art has been more fortunate among English artists of repute. The only two whose deaths are to be noted were Messrs. Beverley and O'Connor, both practitioners of the difficult but ephemeral art of scene-painting. Mr. O'Connor had also earned much distinction of a more durable form. The musical and theatrical world has lost Mme. Carlotta Patti, the less famous of two famous sisters; Mme. Puzzi, a well-known figure in London society, and the best teacher of the true Italian method of singing (a former generation knew her as the Tosi); M. Naudin, the tenor, a veteran who had ranked high in a generation of admirable singers; Mrs. Dallas, better known as Miss Glyn; and Mr. Carl Rosa, who, though a German, struggled manfully to keep life in the tender plant which is called English opera. To these we trust that artistic sense of dignity will permit us to add the name of Hengler, of the circus which has afforded a pleasing spectacle to thousands to whom theatres and opera-houses are inaccessible; and Harry Jupp, the cricketer. Scholarship and science have lost Dr. Kennedy, a great scholar and maker of scholars; Dr. Beal, the Orientalist; Mr. Hennessy, the Celtic scholar; Mr. G. Vigfusson, an Icelander, who spent his life in explaining Scandinavian history and letters to Englishmen; and Professor Maguire. M. Chevreul, the French chemist, was probably best known at the time of his death as the one man who, having lived to see the centenary of the French Revolution, could yet remember the meeting of the States-General in 1789. No very famous name has disappeared from the active list of politicians and soldiers. Mr. Firth and M. Stoyanoff, the Bulgarian, were, indeed, known men, but they could not be included by any laxity of language in the first rank. Lords Eversley and Malmesbury and Sir W. Dunbar in this country; Signors Cairoli and Mancini in Italy; Marshal Quesada in Spain; Count Peter Schuvaloff in Russia; M. Saint-Hilaire, General Faidherbe, and Admiral Jaurès in France; and Mr. Jefferson Davis in the United States were all men who had outlived their period of activity. The deaths of the Archduke Rudolph and of the King of Portugal were political events of various importance, which have been mentioned in their places. French letters have lost MM. Fustel de Coulanges, an historical student of distinct power; Barbey d'Aureville, a man of letters of great originality; and Havet, the theological scholar and Pascalist. Among those whom it is hardly possible to class we have to name Father Damien, who devoted his life heroically to the lepers in the island of Molokai, and Laura Bridgman, the deaf mute, whose education to some degree of intelligence was a wonder of skill and patience.

THE DOGS OF WAR.

ANTONY, it seems, was perhaps not speaking metaphorically after all when he prophesied how the spirit of Cæsar would "cry havoc! and let slip the dogs of war." The modern general may in future campaigns literally do the latter, and will have to reckon Spratt's biscuits amongst the necessities his commissariat will have to provide for. Most Continental armies have already recognized the valuable assistance dogs may render to an army under certain circumstances, and have, at any rate tentatively, made arrangements for utilizing their services. What Germany and Russia think to-day in military matters England, we may safely prophesy, will think to-morrow, and so now that we have actually organized cyclists and mounted infantry, we need feel no surprise if we meet with our faithful "Trays" and "Tobys" duly enrolled amongst the denizens of our camps. And in their case, too, history will but again have repeated itself, and the latest modern innovation once more prove but a revival of an ancient custom. The employment of dogs in war, we have lately been told, was not infrequent from the very earliest times. Corinth is said to have been saved by fifty of these valiant auxiliaries, who, while the rest of the garrison slept, remained on the alert, and performed valuable outpost duty till the drunken revellers were roused. Philip of Macedon utilized their services in pursuing the mountaineers amongst their rocky fastnesses during his campaign against Argile. Attila preferred to trust the safety of his camps to their keen perceptions rather than to the ears and eyes of his Huns. The Romans recognized their value for the same purpose, and the geese of the Capitol came to the rescue not only of men, but of dogs too, who for once were caught napping. The Spanish bloodhounds of the West Indies have been so frequently quoted by excited nationalists, and have supplied so many flowers of rhetoric and invective, that we need not further dwell on this instance. Yet the patriots were either ignorant of, or conveniently forgot, their own history, when they went to the West Indies to find a parallel to Saxon baseness. They might have found one nearer home, which for their especial benefit we will remind them of. The Earl of Essex, in suppressing the rebellion which has since become a feature of every reign, in the time of Elizabeth, is stated to have organized a force of 800 bloodhounds to accompany the army. The old Irish deerhound, too, was a trusty "follower," and seems to have "shadowed" his master even more efficiently than the modern detective watches over judges and Ministers. In more modern times we find the celebrated "Moustache" amongst the heroes of the French army at the commencement of the century. He was decorated by Marshal Lannes at Austerlitz, and finally met a soldier's death in the Peninsula, where he was shot shortly after the siege of Badajoz. At the present time the Russians train dogs to act as sentinels, having found the necessity of their aid during the expedition under Skobelev in Asia Minor, where a stealthy and cunning enemy found means to surprise them on more than one occasion. Their German neighbours began to experiment on the value of dogs for outposts as far back as 1885, and are satisfied as to the assistance they would render in the outpost line. There is no doubt that during inclement and foggy weather the keener perceptions of a dog would be far superior to those of a man, and the confidence that the presence of a trustworthy four-footed companion would give to a sentry in an exposed situation would be immense under such circumstances.

It is a difficult matter in times of peace to understand how an army, especially in these days of education and field-glasses, can be surprised. Yet all the records of war teem with instances where such an enterprise has been successful, and doubtless there will be more of them in the future. The French were surprised at Beaumont in the act of leisurely cooking their dinners, and knew nothing of an enemy's approach till the shells from the German artillery came tumbling into their camp. The presence of a few noisy terriers in Arabi's entrenchments might have spoiled Lord Wolseley's calculations, and made us pay with many valuable lives for our venturesome attack; while what was really a disaster at McNeill's Zereba would never have occurred at all had a few "war-dogs" been with the sentries. A man, after a hard day's fighting or a long march, loses much of his sharpness, and often becomes so exhausted as almost to become indifferent to danger. A dog is less affected by hunger or cold, and does not so readily tire. His faculties longer retain their acuteness, and are more keen from the outset. At night especially the mental strain produced by anxious watching is very great, and tries the nerves of the men severely. It is for this reason that sentries are always posted double, and sometimes, especially in the Russian service, in groups. A dog will wind the approach of a stranger on a calm night a quarter of a mile away, and even in bad weather the combination of scent and hearing with which he is endowed would warn him of danger at half that distance. He has a great advantage, too, over his human rival in that he can distinguish between friend and foe even in the dark. If sentry-posts, therefore, were supplied with canine allies, they might be placed further apart, and the army sleep with increased security notwithstanding. The rôle of the dog in war would not, however, be confined to such duties alone. As scouts in front and on each side of the line of march, they are expected to be likewise useful, and are to undertake some duties which now tell severely both on men and horses. Woods, ravines, farm-buildings, or hamlets, lying close to the line of march, have always to be reconnoitred and searched ere troops can pass them, and the labour and delay thus caused are serious. Parties must be detailed, perhaps, for considerable distances, to the right and left, and the column has to halt till their work is done. The constant recurrence of such duties is very fatiguing, and in an enclosed country it is not easy for a horseman to efficiently perform them. It is thought that a few good dogs, ranging widely from the scouts, would save them an immensity of trouble and do the work equally well. They might thus scour small woods and coverts, and indicate the enemy lurking in ambush in time to allow their friends to avoid being taken unawares. We may thus expect in the future to see a dead-set made at the unseen riflemen, and may imagine the thrill of excitement "to ho!" will send along the advancing line. Perhaps a headstrong, impetuous ranger may even run into and flush a whole covey from the neighbouring thicket, and then we hope we may be near to hear the shout that tells that the quarry has broken cover.

But it is to be hoped that the dog will have his use in war after a more sober fashion also. As a despatch-carrier he should be quite unrivalled, and, especially in action, might, if well trained, convey intelligence where it would be nigh hopeless for a man to venture. He could go as fast as a horse and over far rougher ground. He would be far less easily seen, and he would be far more difficult to hit. But it is claimed likewise for him that he would supplement the transport of ammunition in action, and might be trusted to convey packets of cartridges to the front with a greater chance of safely reaching his destination than either a man or a mule. Here, no doubt, he would also make fewer mistakes, and would not fail to identify the men of his own battalion, while he is said to be equal to carrying eighty rounds at a time, and would not be exhausted by repeated journeys. The St. Bernard has ere now given proof how efficient his services would be in searching for the wounded, and he would thus help to obviate much of the suffering incidental to all campaigns. The sheepdog would, however, probably be the most generally useful breed to employ, although bloodhounds, pointers, setters, poodles, and spaniels have all of them qualities which would make them useful for the purpose. Whether the suggestion will take definite shape in this country remains to be seen, but it is by no means the wild or fanciful notion which it may at first sight appear. On the frontier of Belgium and France smugglers habitually employ dogs trained for their purpose; and, on the other hand, the Custom-House have their canine representatives, who pursue and run down those in the contraband trade. Our sporting breeds of dogs have been more carefully preserved and looked after than on the Continent, and we should have abundant raw material to go upon. By degrees a special breed for military purposes would, no doubt, be developed, and, with patience and perseverance, an abnormally high state of education and intelligence would eventually be arrived at. Some enthusiasts have even gone so far as to advocate the employment of fourfooted look-outs on board ship. These veritable "sea dogs" would, they say, give timely warning of the approach of a torpedo-boat, and might even avert collisions during fogs or thick weather. Such anticipations are, we imagine, as yet somewhat premature, and it will be time enough to discuss the merits of dogs on board ship when we see them doing good service on shore.

THE BUSINESS YEAR.

THE year now rapidly drawing to a close has been the most prosperous the country has seen since 1874. There can no longer be a doubt that the trade revival differs essentially from the delusive improvement of 1879-82, and much more closely resembles that of 1871-4. It has not been preceded by a waste of wealth such as that which was caused by the Franco-German War, nor, consequently, by large orders to make up for that waste, and a transfer to this country of foreign capital for safety. But it is almost as general as the improvement of 1871-4, and it is accompanied by a similar, though smaller, expansion in the volume of business, as well as by a marked rise in wages and prices. It is clear that production has now adjusted itself to the new level of prices, and that there is, consequently, a sufficient margin for profits. There is also, as happened in 1871-4, a great development of new countries, resulting in very large demands for British merchandise of all kinds. Even agriculture has felt the revival. Farmers, it is true, are still suffering from the loss of their capital during so many bad years. But rent and wages have adjusted themselves to the new conditions. Farmers, therefore, are able to conduct their business with profit, and there are, as a result, fewer farms unlet. The position of landowners is less satisfactory. To them, indeed, has now been shifted nearly the whole weight of the agricultural depression. But even they may look forward to the future more hopefully, since they do not experience the same difficulty as recently in letting their lands. It is, however, in trade that the improvement is most manifest. With the exception of the cotton industry, which is suffering from a temporary glut of the markets of the Far East, there is hardly a trade in the country which is not better off than it was a year ago and far better off than it was two years ago. At the end of 1888 there was evidence of a very great revival in the over-sea carrying trade, in shipbuilding, in coal, in most of the minerals, and in miscellaneous industries. But the iron trade continued depressed, and for that reason cautious observers doubted whether the recovery was more real and permanent than that which failed to realize the hopes it excited in 1879-82. During the present year, however, the consumption of iron has largely augmented. Stocks in the North of England have consequently rapidly decreased, and even in Scotland they have diminished. This went on for a considerable time without a rise in price; but during the second half of the year there has been a very rapid advance, amounting to about 45 per cent. in the case of Scotch pig iron, and to very nearly 80 per cent. in the cost of Middlesbrough pig iron. Manufactured iron has risen from 10 to 20 per cent., wool and silk from 10 to 25 per cent., and there has been a rise also in chemicals. The most satisfactory feature of this great recovery in the iron industry is that it has been mainly occasioned by home demands. Iron and coal are the great instruments of modern production, and a general improvement in trade necessarily, therefore, increases the consumption of both. For every industry, then, there has been an augmented demand; but the chief augmentation is for shipbuilding. The final corrected returns of shipbuilding for the whole year are not yet before us; but already it is certain that the new tonnage constructed will somewhat exceed that of 1883, previously the largest ever recorded. On the Clyde the construction is somewhat less than in 1883; but it is larger in the North of England. Compared with last year, the increase on the Tees is about 71 per cent., on the Wear about 51 per cent., and on the Tyne about 32 per cent. In Belfast the increase, though absolutely smaller than in the three cases named, is proportionately much larger, being, indeed, as much as 135 per cent. The workpeople have been able to secure a very satisfactory share of the general prosperity. A list of the year's strikes would at first sight appear formidable; but, with the exception of the London Dock strike, few of them involved a large number of men or were very protracted. The Dock strike, no doubt, inflicted much injury upon the trade of London, and caused much distress among the strikers. But even it affords evidence of the great prosperity of the country, since a vast multitude of unorganized men, dependent for support upon outside subscriptions, were in the end successful. In the great industries of the country the demands of the work-people were conceded with little or no opposition. For example, the miners of Yorkshire, Lancashire, and the Midland Counties, who obtained an advance of 10 per cent. in October of last year, were amicably given another advance of the same proportion in the summer of this year. Nowhere, perhaps, is the revival so marked as at home, but it is very decided also in Germany, where there has been a great rise both in prices and in wages. There is also unquestionable improvement in France, Belgium, Holland, and Austria-Hungary, while the Governments even of Italy and Spain speak hopefully of trade prospects. In the United States two good harvests in succession have stimulated every industry in the country, with the exception of coal, which still remains depressed. In the Argentine Republic the feverish activity of the past few years has continued, and now threatens to bring on a crisis likely to be followed by a long period of depression. In Brazil the policy of internal development has been checked by the revolution. The other South American States are all prosperous. Even Peru is beginning to wake up from its long lethargy, and Central America likewise is making headway. The home and foreign trade of India are both exceedingly active and profitable. The colonies are, speaking generally, doing well, South Africa, in particular, being eagerly engaged in developing its vast mineral wealth.

The goodness of trade has enabled the world's money markets to bear trials which, under other circumstances, might have proved disastrous. At the very beginning of the year the bankruptcy of the Panama Canal Company, with its sixty millions of capital, inflicted heavy loss upon hundreds of thousands of small investors all over France, and shortly afterwards the breakdown of the Copper Syndicate, and the consequent failure of the Comptoir d'Escompte, one of the very greatest of the French banks, which did a large business in the Far East and in South America as well as at home, threatened to paralyse credit in France; but the Bank of France and the other principal bankers of Paris came to the assistance of the market, confidence was quickly restored, and, to the surprise of all observers, prices actually rose upon the Bourse. It seemed inevitable, however, that the bankers would have to pay dearly for their daring enterprise. But they have been rarely favoured. The improvement in trade has been so great that the price of copper, which fell from about 78*l.* a ton to about 35*l.* in the course of a week or so, has since risen to 50*l.* a ton. The consumption of the metal is going on at such a rate that even a further advance seems not improbable. A large part of the assets of the Comptoir d'Escompte consisted of copper, and already this rise in prices enables the bankers to realize without material loss. The success of the Exhibition has likewise greatly favoured them, and so has a good harvest. Their prospects, then, would be fairly good were it not for the Brazilian revolution, which has discredited Brazilian securities with which certain of those bankers had rashly encumbered themselves just before the revolution occurred. Italy, too, has been severely tried by a banking and building crisis, which, however, seems to be coming to an end. In the United States the difficulties of the railroads in the North-West and the South-West, brought on by over-construction, at one time appeared likely to have a disastrous influence upon the New York money and stock markets. Indeed, powerful syndicates of American and European bankers had to intervene to save some of the Companies from bankruptcy. But the good harvest and the stimulus it has given to general trade have so increased railway traffics that the prospect is now brighter than it has been for several years. At the present time the greatest danger hanging over the money markets of the world arises from inflation in the Argentine Republic, followed, naturally, by reckless speculation and wild engagements in all kinds of rash enterprises. The currency has become so depreciated that 230 paper dollars are worth no more than 100 gold dollars, and an utter collapse of speculation seems to be imminent. The Brazilian revolution, too, is a cause of anxiety to the money and the stock markets. The great improvement in trade has hitherto carried the money market safely through its difficulties; but it is not to be overlooked that that improvement itself tends to make loanable capital scarcer and dearer. There being more goods manufactured, more to convey by land and sea and more to market, and there being also larger numbers of men to pay at higher rates of wages, there is a constant outflow of money from the great banking centres of the world to the provinces. Every reserve bank in the world thus finding its funds drawn upon is trying to increase its stock of gold, and in so doing is raising the rates of interest and discount. Here in this country there is another cause of dearer and scarcer money. For several years past British investors have been lending immense sums to Governments, and at the same time have been supplying industrial Companies with vast amounts of capital. The foreign States and foreign Companies thus accommodated have the power to take the gold from London, and of late they have been exercising this power to an inconvenient degree. The Bank of England, in consequence, has had to raise its rate of discount to 5 per cent., and at one time the rate in the open market rose as high, while borrowers were glad to pay the Bank as much as 6 per cent. A serious stringency that might have disturbed trade was averted only by the action of two of our greatest financial houses, which brought gold from New York, St. Petersburg, and other places. This action restored ease, but the market is for all that in such a state that a large withdrawal of gold might cause rates to advance once more in a way that would alarm the business community. In spite, however, of the uncertainty of the money market, the issues of loans and Companies this year in London have been larger than in any of the preceding ten, amounting in the aggregate to about 180 millions sterling. A large proportion of the loans, however, were conversion loans; and, therefore, did not raise new capital. Several of the new Companies, too, were in reality conversions of private undertakings into joint stock Companies. Still, when all allowances are made, the new issues have been for a very large amount. The Indian and Colonial Governments have raised about 13 millions sterling. Argentine borrowings, in spite of the critical condition of the Republic, amounted to about 10 millions sterling; and for railways of all kinds about 24 millions sterling were asked for. The peculiarity of the year's issues, however, has been the immense number of trust and investment Companies brought out, of breweries and distilleries, and of South African mining, exploration, and land Companies. We may add that the completion of Mr. Goschen's conversion plan was effected this year. Practically it had been already accomplished, little more than 42 millions sterling remaining to be dealt with.

On the Stock Exchange the rise in prices has continued. In spite of the new issues the savings of the world have been so large and the prospects of trade so good that, high as quotations were at the beginning, they are still higher at the end. There is little change, it is true, in Consols; but colonial government, British corporation, home railway debenture and preference stocks, and the ordinary stocks of British railways, show material advances, especially British railway ordinary stocks. Amongst these the greatest rise has been in the Deferred, or "A" stock of the London and Brighton Company. Most foreign government bonds are likewise higher, especially Egyptian Unified; but, with the exception of Egyptian Bonds, there has been exceedingly little business in these securities upon the London Stock Exchange. As a matter of course, in consequence of the revolution in Brazil and of the crisis in Buenos Ayres, Brazilian and Argentine stocks are lower. There is a very considerable rise in American railroad securities, with very few exceptions; but in these likewise there has been very little business on the London Stock Exchange. Throughout the year, indeed, British holders have been selling and American capitalists have been buying. The movement, therefore, is almost entirely due to American operators. There are a few exceptions, such as Louisville and Nashville, in which London capitalists co-operated with those of America. The greatest speculation throughout the year has been in South African gold, diamond, and land shares, in nitrate shares, brewery shares, and in trust Companies. South African shares, however, have fallen very heavily from the prices reached early in the year. In many cases the quotations now are not half what they were then. Nitrate shares, too, after having been run up rapidly, have fallen considerably. In industrial securities there has been a great advance and a considerable decline, but brewery shares for the most part are higher than at the beginning of the year. During the past few months the state of the money market has deterred speculators from engaging in new risks. A fear has been ever present to their minds that if they were to buy very largely they might be unable to obtain the loans which would then become necessary, and that thus they might incur ruinous losses. Gradually, therefore, they have been lessening rather than increasing their accounts. For a little while, indeed, after Messrs. Rothschild and Messrs. Baring Brothers brought gold from New York, St. Petersburg, and other unexpected places, there was an inclination manifested to speculate more freely, it being thought that the danger of serious stringency in the money market was then averted. The Brazilian revolution, however, checked the movement, and since then speculation has come to a standstill. Caution, too, has been imposed by the extreme difficulties encountered in Berlin at Liquidation after Liquidation ever since September, and still more by the growing severity of the crisis in Buenos Ayres. In spite of all this, however, speculators generally look forward to the new year with great confidence. That they do so is clear from what we have just been showing, that prices generally are so much higher now than they were at the end of last year.

THE THIRD CHRISTMAS DAY UNDER THE COMMONWEALTH.

THE Council of State and the Parliament assembled for their debates on Christmas Day 1651 with a sense of security which had been wanting in 1650. Their "crowning mercy," the battle of Worcester, seemed to have crushed the power of the old English Monarchy beyond all possibility of a restoration. It had no strength left except in the hearts of the English people, and the people were despised as the ungodly rabble by the self-appointed Government of "Saints." The Lord of Hosts, in giving the Commonwealth victory over Charles II., as Dr. John Owen told the Calvinist Rump Parliament in his sermon on their "day of thanksgiving for the destruction of the Scots Army at Worcester," thought not at Worcester of all the nation. He thought only of "the remnant of Jacob, God's secret and holy ones, lying in the bowels of the nation; for they alone enjoy the sweetness of this and every mercy." The word "all" was hateful alike to the political and religious oligarchs; and the fact that Christmas Day was a festival for all men was probably a sufficient condemnation of it in their eyes. Although the ungodly multitude were restrained by law from going to church, they kept the feast as usual in their houses; and the grim politicians were again offended as they went forth on Christmas Day morning to do the work of the State by seeing the quiet contempt of the people for their religious legislation. For in 1651, as in 1650, it was observed that nearly all the shops were shut. Probably many of the Christmas Day idlers were enjoying in their houses the irreverent jests of Sir John Birkenhead against their rulers, which were published anonymously during the Christmastide of 1651. He proposed the writing of a treatise called "Bellum grammaticale;" or That Parliamentdom, Councildom, Committeedom, or Sworddom are better words than Christendom or Kingdom." He dared to satirize in the same pamphlet two of Dr. Owen's Independent colleagues in the favour and pay of the new Republic—William Strong, who had "gathered a Congregation" of "parliament-men" and rich Independents "of quality" in Westminster Abbey; and Hugh Peters, whom he accused of "preaching against Christmas Day," and yet on "the same day eating two mince-pies for his dinner." Although the heads of the military oligarchy were pleased to call England by fine Liberal titles, such as a "Free State" and a Commonwealth, the Cavalier was the more genuine Democrat, or representative of the whole English people. One of Birkenhead's "Cases for Tender Consciences" was, "Whether Cavaleers may have one Christmas in twelve year, when the States (in Parliament assembled) keepe Christmas all the yeare round?"

Both the Council of State and the Parliament had a busy day. The Council had debated on Christmas Eve about the fit ceremonies to be used at the approaching reception of the Spanish Ambassador. The King of Scots was appealing for help to the other kings of Christendom; the newspapers of the day are full of letters on his appeals to the rulers of France, Denmark, Sweden, and Poland. The elder sister republic of Holland unnaturally sympathized with the King instead of the Republic—a fault due, as one of the official journals said, to the influence exercised upon the Princess of Orange by her "prelatical chaplain." The acknowledgment of the new "Commonwealth of Sectaries" by so great a foreign Power as Spain, although it was unfortunately the most Popish and anti-Christian of all the Powers, was a matter of keen gratification to the masters of England, and of as keen distress to Richard Baxter. "How came it," asked he, "that we were drawn into a war with Scotland and Holland"—those two good old Nonconformist States—"when we could keep peace with Spain"—anti-Christ's own right hand? The puritanical Council of State discovered that it must observe some ritual and ceremonial in its political communion with the Popish idolaters of Spain. Hence, not only on Christmas Eve, but on Christmas Day, and also on the afternoon of Boxing Day, the Council of State was solemnly deliberating upon points of ceremonial. The birthday of the Prince of Peace was further occupied by the Council with debates upon its military concerns in Scotland and Ireland; with the amount of pay—"twelve pence a day"—to be made to the Guards of the Parliament and the Guards of the City; with the repairing of "James's," so that the three regiments of soldiers quartered in Sion College, to the displeasure of the Nonconformist incumbents of the City parishes, might be removed to St. James's Palace; with a grant of 50*l.* to Majors Wigan and Allen "for fire and candles for the guards about Whitehall, James's, and the City." On the Christmas Day of 1651 the Council was much agitated by a sort of apparition of the ghost of Charles I. Though dead, he was speaking, and gave them scarcely less trouble than his exiled son. Letters came from two searchers at Gravesend, saying that they had discovered in a ship a number of printed copies of "the late King's book"—the Εκὼν βασιλική, "that phoenix risen out of his majesties ashes," as the terrible Clement Walker called it. The fact that fifty editions of this prohibited book had already been published was a discomfiting evidence of its popularity, and of the secret inclinations of the English folk. The Parliament had ordered John Durie, "the pacificator," to translate Milton's reply to it into the French tongue; and the agents of the Commonwealth were circulating the French edition on the Continent. On Christmas Day the Council ordered a letter of approval to be written to Messrs. Barrow and Pelling, the Gravesend searchers, and instructed them "to stay the ship" in which the bad books were found. The Council resolved that they must be "satisfied by whom the books were put on board, that further proceedings may be taken against them." They had conquered the father and the son; but the father's book confronted them in all corners, with the prophetic motto on its title-page, "More than Conqueror."

The Parliament had an equally busy Christmas. It was a Parliament quite after the latest Radical ideal, so far as it had no House of Lords. Yet it could not be well called a House of Commons, for the "Commons" had no voice in the election of its members, and they spent a great part of the old superstitious festival in looking after one another's private interests. The members debated the charges brought by Mr. Primate, who was supported by their restless foe John Lilburne, against Sir Arthur Hazlerig. This eminent Liberationist was loaded with the plunder of the Church. He held Bishops Auckland and other manors of the See of Durham, of which the Long Parliament had despoiled the pious and aged Bishop Morton, and was building a splendid mansion for himself out of the "nationalization" of Church property. His fellow-members of Parliament at once rewarded his loyalty to the party and rid themselves of the most able and popular of their enemies by ordering Primate and Lilburne to pay enormous damages to Sir Arthur Hazlerig, while they banished Lilburne for ever from England, Scotland, and Ireland, under threat of death if he should return. Sir William Brereton was another of the members whom the Liberationist Parliament recompensed with Church plunder. A part of the old archiepiscopal property at Croydon, which is now being restored to pious and humane uses, fell into his hands; which moved Sir John Birkenhead to ask, in one of his "Cases of Conscience," Christmastide 1651, "Whether Sir William Brereton doth devour Church-lands, since he made the Chappell at Croydon his kitchen?" The most exciting subject of debate in the House on Christmas Day, however, was the contemporary phase of the perennial Irish question, where their Lord Deputy Ireton had lately died, and Ludlow was holding office, from which he was to be displaced by Lambert. Several letters from Ireland were read, most of which contained gratifying news. "Every day," said one letter, "addresses are made by the rebels who desire to submit. The greatest part of one regiment of the Tories have already submitted, and many others are now in treating. The knot beginning to be loose, it will quickly be undone." "Several troops of the Tories," said another letter, "are submitting to the Parliament of England." Scotland was giving them much more trouble; but Thursday, December 25, does not seem to have been a Scotch day in the House. They had crushed all military resistance in Scotland; the last remains of the old Scottish army under Lord Balcarras had just capitulated to Colonel Lilburne; but neither swords nor laws could break the spirit of the Scotch Presbyterian clergy, who knew they had the sympathy of all their Covenanting Nonconformist brethren of England. "They put up a cunning prayer for their King," said a letter from Dundee, "where they think they may do it safely." On Christmas Eve the English deputy-governor proclaimed at Edinburgh, by beat of drum, "that the day called Christmas should not be observed, but that all people should freely follow their respective callings." It was a work of pure supererogation, for the Presbyterian foes of the English Republic were as little likely as its Independent friends to keep Christmas, and the deputy-governor needlessly reported on the next day that the ordinance "had been observed nemine contradicente." The loyalty of the Scottish Nonconformists to their king in exile was sorely tried a few days after Christmas. They received the dreadful news from Paris that the "covenanted King," the sworn champion of Presbyterian Nonconformity, had been seduced into covenant breaking. "He hath resumed his Mass-book of Common Prayer, at which the King-doting Scots are much offended and cry shame upon him." He not only kept Christmas Day, but he received the Holy Communion at the hands of a prelatist and received it "kneeling." Evelyn was present at this Christmas Day celebration in Sir Richard Browne's private chapel in Paris, and noticed that Lord Biron and Wilmot were "holding the long towel all along the altar."

Two new Acts of the Rump Parliament were dated to come in force on Christmas Day 1651. The first was characteristically out of keeping with the old character of the day as the birthday of the Prince of Peace. It was the "Act for raising ninety thousand pounds a month for six months, to begin on the 25th of December 1651, for the maintenance of the forces in England, Ireland, and Scotland, raised by the authority of Parliament for the service of the Commonwealth." The people looked upon it as a grim Christmas present. The other Act was more acceptable, and is said by A Perfect Diurnall, January 5, 1652, to have "given great content to private families." On December 12 the Parliament had voted that, "after the 25th of December 1651, no Excise shall be set upon any beer at all, except such as is brewed by common brewers, to be sold by vintners, innkeepers, alehouse-keepers, cooks, chandlers, or such as brew in their own houses to sell again." It was an impolitic blow at a powerful trade, but it is said to have much increased the home-brewing of beer.

There was no repetition in 1651 of the anti-Christmas pamphleteering of former years. The old Nonconformists, from whose camp it had proceeded, had been appalled at the issue of the battle of Worcester, and the Commonwealth kept them in terror by the warnings which it had just given them in the execution of so popular a Presbyterian as Christopher Love, and in the arrest of Jenkin and other foremost Nonconformist incumbents in London. "To be revenged on the Parliament," said John Fry, M.P. for Shaftesbury, "is the thing they aim at." The Independents and the newer sorts of Sectaries evolved out of Independency enjoyed the whole patronage and favour of the State. The Nonconformists had as much as they could do to hold their own against the "Gifted Brethren" who invaded the churches and pulpits. The years 1651 and 1652 were deluged with treatises and pamphlets of the Presbyterian Nonconformists against the Sectaries and of the Sectaries against the Nonconformists. The men who had preached up the Long Parliament, and in whose interest it had expelled the national bishops and priests, were now being beaten with weapons which they had themselves forged. The new Sects were incessantly petitioning the Parliament, the Lord General, and the officers of the army, "to rid ther of the burthen of Tithes," and the intruded Nonconformist incumbents flooded the press with books and sermons asserting the perpetual obligation of tithes. The English people had equal dislike to Nonconformist and Separatist and Independent. Although there was no demand for books against Christmas, and the supply of such ceased, the popularity of books in defence of it is evident from the frequent republication of Edward Fisher's Christian Caveat. At least one new edition appeared every year until 1655, and in some years there seem to have been two editions of the book in which "that worthy, learned, laborious, judicious gentleman, Edward Fisher"—as the anonymous author of Festorum Metropolis called him in 1652—"hath lately sufficiently brayed them and their foolish objections in a mortar."

A few of the clergy still contrived here and there to minister to the people. W. Hughes, in a dedicatory letter to Cromwell prefixed to "A sermon preached anno 1651 at the assizes at Abingdon," begged the Lord General to use his influence to get these "Dumb Doggs" ejected. He complained to Cromwell that those commissioned for that purpose "were not active and impartial, either to find out or to turn out such." He expected there was "a nest of such about the country. But where the fault is, whether the people will not inform, or those empowered not reform, I cannot say." The member for Shrewsbury, who had been one of the King's judges, threw the blame upon the affection of the parishes for their expelled priests. He said it was useless for the Nonconformist incumbents to go on "casting their pearls before swine, who scorn both them and the [Calvinist] Gospel, and would destroy them, were it not for fear of the laws, that they might be restored to their cavalier and prelatical teachers again."

The Christmas number of the Severall Proceedings in Parliament (December 24, 1651, to January 1, 1652) contains an advertisement which throws a new light upon the brutal deformation and plundering of the Liberationist Rump Parliament. "At Litchfield, in Staffordshire, is great store of lead to be sold, by reason of the taking down of the Cathedrall Church or Minster there, and also the Bels of the said Church, all which will be sold worth the money. If any please to repair thither to buy them, they may be wel used in the price." It was in 1651 that George Fox, as yet the only Quaker preacher, stirred at the sight of "the three steeplehouse spires," marched "barefooted up and down the streets, crying in a loud voice, Woe to the bloody city of Lichfield!" It was "three days before the time called Christmas" in 1651 that the eager young founder of Quakerism entered York, where, said he, "I was commanded of the Lord to go to the great Minster, and speak to priest Bowles [the Nonconformist, who was ejected at the Restoration] and his people in their great Cathedral." The land so swarmed with wild Ranters, who had all Fox's fanaticism without his meditative depth and solid morality, that there was some justification for Birkenhead's Christmas-tide jest that the keeper of Bedlam informed the Parliament "all his prisoners had broke loose, and were turned preachers."

MONEY MATTERS.

AT the beginning of the week the Bank of England continued borrowing for the purpose of reducing the supply of loanable capital in the outside market. This, with the gold exports, the collection of the revenue, the accumulation of money by bankers and others, with the object of showing handsome balances at the end of the year, and the preparations that are being made for the innumerable payments that fall due on the two or three last days of December and the few first days of January, have caused interest rates to advance. The Bank has been paying about 4 per cent. on loans for the rest of the month. As much as 5 per cent. was charged to other borrowers in the open market. But the Bank of England charged 6 per cent. At the Stock Exchange Settlement, which began yesterday morning, the average rate was from $5\frac{1}{2}$ to $5\frac{3}{4}$ per cent. The rate of discount has not risen as much as might have been expected. There is a good deal of competition by Continental bankers; and, besides, bill-brokers and discount-houses hope that early next month the money market will become quite easy. That, however, does not seem probable to the most careful observers. It is true that the tendency usually is for the rates of interest and discount to fall rapidly in the first three months of the year, but there are many causes to counteract that tendency at present. The Paris rate of exchange upon London is declining so much that fears have arisen that gold may be taken to Paris. The movement, however, seems to be temporary. The Bank of France holds nearly 51 millions sterling in gold, and there seems no reason why an addition should be made to that vast sum. The state of the Berlin money market gives more cause for disquietude; but it may be expected that early in the New Year coin and notes will return in considerable amount from the provinces to Berlin, and will relieve the pressure there. Besides, it is reasonable to anticipate that any assistance which may be required by Berlin will be afforded by the bankers of Paris and St. Petersburg. There is still stronger ground for looking with apprehension upon the state of affairs in Buenos Ayres. The depreciation of the paper currency continues as great as ever, and is likely to become worse as time goes on. At the same time a collapse of speculation appears to be imminent. There is, therefore, a very strong demand for gold in Buenos Ayres; and, if the shipments to that city continue on the scale of the past few weeks, it is scarcely possible that there can be much reduction in rates in London. The Bank of France, to prevent disturbance of the London money market, may consent to supply the demands of Buenos Ayres. But still as long as the present critical condition of the Buenos Ayres market continues there can be no real confidence here in the future of the money market. It is not reasonable, therefore, to expect very cheap and abundant money in the early future.

The exports of merchandise from India continue exceptionally large, and, as the market for cotton-piece goods is glutted for the moment, the value of the exports largely exceeds that of the imports. In consequence the difference has to be settled by large remittances of silver, and, as the Mint is also buying, there would probably be a further advance in the price of the metal were it not that American speculators, disappointed at Mr. Windom's proposals, have sent unusually large quantities to London during the past few days. It is said, indeed, that a considerable part of the receipts is being held for a rise; but, all the same, the magnitude of the exports from America has rather depressed the market.

Business on the Stock Exchange was practically suspended on Monday and Tuesday. Yesterday, the beginning of the settlement compelled the attendance of members, and there was greater activity. With the exception of Brazilian and Argentine securities, in spite of the small business that has been done for two or three weeks now, prices have remained surprisingly steady. Indeed, a few days before Christmas there was a recovery in South African gold, diamond, and land shares. During this month the crushings of ore by the South African Companies show a considerable increase over those of last month. This encouraged speculation in the hope that public interest will revive in the shares, and it looks as if an attempt were about to be made to get up another boom. British railway stocks, too, are in good demand. For the six months now ending the railway traffic returns show an increase of about $5\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. compared with little more than 2 per cent. for the corresponding period of last year, and about $1\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. for the corresponding period of the year before. Nothing, perhaps, proves more clearly the great improvement in trade than that the earnings of the railway Companies have steadily increased for three years in succession, and that the aggregate increase in the six months now terminating is more than twice as great proportionately as that of the corresponding period of last year. There has been a good deal of quiet investment in these stocks for some weeks past. It is not probable that the rise in prices and wages will much affect the dividends to be declared next month and the month after; but it is almost certain that they will tell considerably upon the dividends for next year. The coal contracts now running out have all to be renewed at much higher prices, and so have contracts for material, such as iron; while railway employes have obtained an advance in wages. In American railroad securities there has been next to nothing doing in London; but prices are well maintained, there being an almost universal belief that the opening of the new year will bring ease to the New York money market, and that then there will be a very sharp advance in prices.

The Liquidation on the Berlin Bourse appears to be going on smoothly. Borrowers have to pay smartly for the accommodation they require. Even those in good credit and with unexceptionable security are charged 8 and 9 per cent. But the accommodation has been given, and apparently the Liquidation will be got over safely. It is hoped now that the threatened strikes in the coal trade are averted, and it is expected that the new year will bring ease to the money market. In Germany, as elsewhere, coin and notes usually return from the general circulation to the great banking centres in the beginning of the year, and the rates of interest and discount, therefore, fall. Apparently, too, the threatened collapse on the Buenos Ayres Bourse is being staved off. The difficulties of the speculators are very great, but somehow or other it would seem that they have been given the assistance they require. According to the latest reports by mail the prospects of the coming harvest were very good. And it is hoped that good crops may enable the country to pass through the crisis without an actual collapse. Much, too, is expected from the negotiations still going on with syndicates of bankers in London and Paris. Meanwhile the crisis continues, and is extremely acute.

GAMBLING.

I.

THE recent raids on the baccarat clubs in London, and the substantial fines inflicted upon their proprietors, have had the effect of stamping out, for a time at any rate, these undesirable institutions. But their history is not uninteresting in its way.

The mode of foundation of the baccarat club in London was simplicity itself. Capitalists of Hebrew extraction, solicitors of doubtful reputation, and two or three ex-military officers used to meet together and constitute themselves into a committee. The next step was to take a house, and the next to elect members. The election to the club in question was apparently bona fide. An entrance fee was paid, and a year's subscription was paid—a few pounds are nothing to a professional gambler. But the club was a mere pretence. If you joined it believing it to be a bona fide club, and went there for dinner, you would probably have found that there was no soup, no fish, and no vegetables to speak of. You could have had a mutton chop, or a steak, or a Welsh rabbit; liquor, of course; and that is about all. The people who went to it went to play and for no other purpose. And, whatever particular device may have been adopted, the percentage on the gambling of the evening went steadily into the pockets of the proprietors; and this percentage often used to amount to as much as a hundred pounds a night. There were various ways of extracting this large profit. Sometimes a discount was demanded for changing cheques, and a sufficiently heavy discount, too. Another plan was to charge a fee, collected by the waiter, for each game that was played. The fee was levied on the banker, and each time that the bank changed hands the fee was paid. It was upon these fees that the proprietors of such clubs used to rely, and not upon their mutton-chops and claret. In some cases the proprietors made a point, wherever possible, of keeping the bank themselves, or else they arranged that it should be kept by a friend of theirs. During certain of the recent prosecutions it was clearly proved in evidence that a banker at baccarat has certain distinct advantages, of which he can avail himself if he is so disposed, and can so cover his fee for taking the bank and make a handsome profit into the bargain. The clubs in question were simply a revival of the old gambling hells.

There will always be gamblers, as there will always be drunkards. Both vices are practically ineradicable; and, as far as gambling is concerned, this fact points in favour of Monte Carlo. Of two evils, it is better to choose the lesser. A public place which is only open at stated hours during the day, and where you can only lose the money which you happen to have upon you, is infinitely preferable to private gambling, which leads to playing upon credit, to subsequent quarrels, and to sitting up all night in a vitiated atmosphere of smoke, drink, and excitement. Evidently gamblers have found this out for themselves, or else gambling must be terribly on the increase; for every two or three years the Casino at Monte Carlo has to be enlarged in answer to the demands of the enormous crowds who yearly flock there. At the present time a new wing is in course of construction, and this wing will contain several additional tables (the two trente-et-quarante and the six roulette tables being found insufficient to accommodate the players). At Monte Carlo, at any rate, you can only abuse the "Administration" if you lose, and you get no abuse in return. The doors are still open to you the next day, the same smiling servants take your hat and coat, and the most urbane of croupiers invites you to "play the game." Moreover, there are always wonderful stories of gigantic sums won by people who were at their last gasp, and, indeed, some of them are absolutely true. Last year, it is an authentic fact that an Italian who had just been made bankrupt in his own country, arrived at Monaco with thirty francs (in English money about twenty-four shillings). With this slender capital he managed to win 2,400*l.*, and when his luck turned and 400*l.* of his winnings disappeared, he left off playing and returned to Italy to set up in business again with his capital of 2,000*l.* Of course these cases are very rare, but nevertheless they do occur sometimes, and many people who hear about them are thereby induced to play. The bank has a steady advantage in its favour. The percentage is small, but it is certain, and, of course, the longer you play the more positive is it that you will lose. Still, if people will gamble, and, as the Bishop of Peterborough has pointed out, it is evident that there are those who cannot live without this excitement, then perhaps the best method of indulging in their favourite pastime is to go to Monte Carlo, and at any rate get a fair run for their money. They will probably lose, but anyhow they will not be cheated.

REVIEWS.

JOURNAL OF THE MARINE BIOLOGICAL ASSOCIATION.*

THE Marine Biological Association, whose laboratory has now been opened nearly eighteen months, may be warmly congratulated on the portion of the Journal lately published. There are, it is true, some hard things said of Dinophilus, which appears to be practically a "trochosphere," and Palæmon serratus has had its internal anatomy examined in a way that will make every respectable crustacean blush like a boiled lobster. Saving exceptions of this kind, which are, we believe, a good deal in fashion among biologists, we may say of much of the number that it is most excellent and entertaining reading.

So, indeed, it ought to be, for it is about objects of natural history. Let the reader, unless he be spoiled by the flagstones of Cheapside or Piccadilly, imagine the delight that Adam must have felt when the total kind

Of birds, in orderly array on wing,
Came summoned over Eden to receive Their names.

Let him recall, if he can, the delights of his own youthful days in the country, when, to adapt a passage of Mr. Pattison's, his perceptions of living things were not blunted by long names, phylogenetic problems, or learned Societies' discussions. The truth of the matter is, that science is not only in danger of burying itself under its own discoveries, but of divorcing itself from the general interest of mankind by the very profundity of its acquirements.

In the case of zoology it is easy enough to trace the various stages; the habit of collecting led to the necessity for systematic arrangement, and the method of Linnæus was so ingenious, so discriminating, and so wise, that it became the foundation of the systematic study of natural things. Admirable as it was, it was barren, in the sense that it dealt only with known things, and offered no philosophy of nature; it gathered a great crowd of observers and systematists round its still wonderful nucleus, but it ended here. It was followed by the method of Cuvier, which so far reformed systematic natural history that it insisted on a more complete investigation and comparison of the objects studied; in the hands of its master and of his followers, notable among whom was Richard Owen, it developed that aspect of the science which is called Comparative Anatomy. But the discussion of the homologies of the bones of the skull is certainly a dry, if not a dreary, subject, and more and more the animal morphologist drifted from the naturalist; it was no longer necessary to know anything at all about the beast or its ways; the possession of a complete skeleton or an uninjured liver was all that was wanted. Then there came yet another new light—the wonderful discoveries of Von Baer and the students of development; but this, alas! has met with the fate of its predecessors; all an embryologist need do now is to get a section-cutting machine and a chick, and chop up the latter as fine as he can, and stain it as brightly as he may. And nobody but an embryologist can have a good word for such a Philistine. Yet another light arose, the greatest, purest light of this century; Darwin came, and with him there seemed to come wisdom. But no; the systematic naturalist was at it again! For him the study of nature was not as for Darwin; it was not the patient watching of living things, nor the breathing of life into naturalists' studies. He must commence his weaving of phylogenies, and he has done it till he is tired of it.

These were "forks" enough with which to expel nature, in all conscience; they were more, at any rate, than the poet ever dreamt of. But "Mother Nature," as she is called when the writer is hard up for copy, was still one too many for the obscurantists, and naturalists are becoming Darwinians now that they look on animals and plants as living things, from which the methods of science can extort the secrets of life. As Professor Flower wisely put it in his British Association address, we want "labour not only in museums, laboratories, and dissecting-rooms, but in the homes and haunts of the animals themselves, watching and noting their ways amid their natural surroundings, by which means alone we can endeavour to penetrate the secrets of their life-history." There will be naturalists still who doubt this. Let them take a living animal to one of their learned Societies, and see the excitement it produces; let them compare the number of visitors to the cases of birds in the Natural History Museum with that of those who go the "Osteological Gallery."

So, then, even with men of science, sense comes at last; give them time, there is a hand that guides. The public found out long ago that what they wanted were living things, and they established and supported Zoological Gardens and Aquaria—of a kind, the naturalists reply, in a tone that induces us to compare them to London County Councillors.

As between Zoological Gardens and Marine Aquaria there can, for the naturalist, be no comparison. A lion in a cage is not a lion in a rage, or may not be, and that is about all that can be said; but in a well-arranged and sufficiently spacious aquarium, such as that which the Association has built at Plymouth, there is ample opportunity for the inhabitants to exhibit many, if not all, of the habits which they possess in the sea itself, and they easily lend themselves, as Professor Preyer's most interesting observations on Brittle-stars at Naples show, to ingenious experiments.

The observations which Mr. Bateson has made at Plymouth on the senses and habits of some Crustacea strike us as being particularly interesting. Nearly all were found to take their food by night, and most had each its own place to which it retired when morning came; à propos of lions it will be remembered that David, who really had some good opportunities of observing them, long ago made similar observations. The human is not, apparently, the only species which is fond of shrimps; we learn that wrasses, which are especially fond of shrimps, can not only catch them as they swim in the water, but pursue them on the bottom. The sight of the wrasse is particularly keen, and I have often seen a large wrasse search the sand for shrimps, turning sideways and looking with either eye independently like a chameleon. Its vision is so good that it can see a shrimp with certainty when the whole body is buried in sand, excepting the antennæ and antenna-plates. It should be borne in mind that, if the sand be fine, a shrimp will bury itself absolutely, digging with its swimmerets, kicking the sand forwards with its chelæ, finally raking the sand over its back and gently levelling it with its antennæ, but if the least bit be exposed, the wrasses will find it, in spite of its protective colouration.

Turning from this interesting aspect of the work which is going on at Plymouth to a consideration of what has been already done in another important branch of the Association's work—the cultivation and study of sea-fish—we note that two things at least are wanting; so far, however, as the Association is concerned we may say one only, and that, we need hardly add, is more money. Great difficulties are found in the way of feeding fish after the earlier stages are passed through; this could be overcome if the Association had, like Captain Dannevig, of Arendal, in Norway, large basins or tidal tanks, into which the sea is admitted directly by means of sluice-gates. As the Director, Mr. Bourne, very properly remarks, "Success in rearing fish is probably to be obtained only by the use of tidal ponds, into which the newly-hatched fry can be turned loose." Mr. Weldon, who is engaged in a study of the life-history of the lobster, had a most unfortunate experience; having found that he could not rear young lobsters in the tanks of the Aquarium beyond a certain stage, he more nearly mimicked the creature's natural surroundings by the conversion of the hull of a disused trawler into a well-vessel; "for a fortnight everything went well"; but then the vessel sprung a leak, and on the 20th of July several thousands of young lobsters escaped. Misfortunes like this are inevitable when limited means are alone at the naturalist's disposal; had the taxpayer been more generous he would not have had, as he has now, to wait yet another year before seeing some way of getting lobster-indigestion more cheaply than heretofore.

Another inquiry of great practical importance is connected with the migrations of large bodies of fish; this can only be solved by the somewhat obvious method of following them about, but this operation can only be effected when the Association has a large and seaworthy boat. It is greatly to be wished that this want could be supplied, for we are confident that the naturalists who are engaged in the work at Plymouth are perfectly capable of obtaining a large amount of useful information had they but the means. On the other hand, the Association has no right to complain as yet; it has been generously aided by the Government, by the City Companies, by some of the learned Societies, and a few gentlemen of fortune. Now it has justified its existence and the hopes of its best friends, and it may, we believe, with confidence appeal to the State and to the friends of science for further aid in undertakings which, from both the scientific and the practical sides, are full of value and importance.

One critical suggestion only will we make; some of the memoirs in the current number of the Journal might just as well have been presented to some learned Society or well-established morphological periodical. We are sure that the Association will do well if they confine their Journal to a record of that kind of natural history observation which is only possible at a station such as theirs at Plymouth. If it be a matter of concern, we may assure them that we believe they will get more purchasers. Let this new Journal be a "Popular Science," a "Science for All," a "Young Naturalist's Friend" of the healthy and really scientific sort, which excites a love for the study of living things, and leave the systematist, the morphologist, and the embryologist to the tender mercies of those who have already published such a prodigious number of their memoirs for them.

NOVELS AND STORIES.*

DODO and I is not a bad title in itself for a one-volume novel, but it has uncommonly little to do with the story. The supposed narrator is a certain Captain Cunninghame, and Dodo is not a lady baptized Dorothea, but a fellow-officer. A short preface, signed D. C., asserts that Cairo is considerably changed—there is even a new dining-room at Sheppard's—"since it was the happy hunting-ground of the Dodo and I." Captain Haggard's title would have been more accurately descriptive, and not less within the grammatical limits which he assigns to his lively pen, if it had been "Me: and occasionally Dodo." The story, which is rather a good one, turns upon the adventures of Captain Cunninghame (and occasionally Dodo) with a set of people whose manners, morals, and demeanour were perfectly commonplace and prosaic, except that they belonged to a society for promoting physical (not psychical) research, the practical result of which was that they could produce magic-lantern pictures of any place they chose, and see what was happening there, as in a camera obscura, and could, by a simple and inexpensive process, resolve themselves (and any clothes they happened to be wearing) into their constituent atoms, and proceed at a rather faster pace than an electric signal to the place they were thinking of when they did so. They reached that place in a material but impalpable form, and when there could come together again in a few seconds. This they called "disintegrating" and "re-integrating," and the only objection was that it was not very difficult for one of them to disintegrate another without that other wishing to be disintegrated.

They were called "Gnostics"; and why they did not select a newer and less misleading name it is extremely difficult to surmise. Two of them were very agreeable ladies—one strictly proper, and the other emphatically otherwise—and Captain Cunninghame (who eventually became a "Gnostic" himself) had the singular good fortune to enter into the most agreeable relations with both of them, those relations being as proper in the former case and as improper in the latter as were the ladies respectively. Captain Haggard is much too sensible to trouble himself about the minor probabilities of life. He boldly makes the "disintegration" of one of his heroines, and its consequences, the leading topic of conversation and journalism in London. He brings his whole company into the Divorce Court either as principals or witnesses, and the frantic extravagance of their proceedings there transcends all the other extravagances of the lively story. But in one thing he is to blame. One "Gnostic" murders another with a knife in open court and in the presence of the judge, both having been witnesses in the cause just determined. "Two policemen"—British policemen!—"now came up [Captain Haggard writes as if Probate Court No. 2 were as big as Westminster Hall] and asked the judge, who had been looking on apparently quite unmanned, 'Shall we arrest him, sir?'" They called him—a British judge—"Sir"! And he—a British judge!—said, "Oh, dear me, yes; at least, I suppose so, but I don't quite know the criminal law on these points. . . . Can you tell me the law, Mr. Crusham, in a case like this?" Nor is it only our peerless British judicature at whose expense Captain Haggard thus overleaps all the bounds of lawful satire; it is either Sir James Hannen or Mr. Justice Butt. The dates are conclusive. And to imagine either of these learned persons acting thus requires far more faith than to swallow "disintegration" and all the other marvels of the story. Nevertheless, it is a pleasing tale, calculated to carry the reader, say, a hundred and fifty miles northwards or twenty-five miles southwards from London, in a shorter time than many better books.

When one reads on the first page of a story that a man's residence is "in the Berkshire Hills," one is apt to overlook the capital H, and "travelers" on the fourth page may pass as a printer's error, so that when the eighth page unmasks the full horrors of "every fiber of feminine curiosity," eyes that "traveled," and "standing back of the invalid's chair," one feels indignant at having an American novel—published in London, too—sprung upon one without warning. Such is the first offence of Roslyn's Trust. The second is that the heroineship is divided between a suffering nincompoop and an insufferable young person of the class of humanity which aspires to be like Lucy Snowe. The third is in one way meritorious, being the extreme intricacy of the plot, which involves the kidnapping of a lunatic, and even a secret chamber and other venerable devices, laudable, indeed, beyond the Atlantic—back of the Atlantic, as they would say themselves—but heaped together in this instance too cumbrously for the reader's enjoyment. The phrase "back of," by the way, is oddly, and almost unintelligibly, used in one place:—"The tears which had hung heavily back of the girl's dark eyes were falling now." What does Miss Lillie mean? Where on earth did those tears hang before they fell? And who saw them? And how did they get round? And where did they fall to? The governess-girl, whose name was Sylvia, was a nobly intrepid flirt, and made love so brilliantly to a rich lawyer from the first moment of their meeting that she ran him down without a check. The other girl was a Virginian, and the author, in her endeavour to make her both less Amurrican and more of a lady than the orthodox or Northern Amurrican girl, has made her extremely insipid. The villain married her, but left her at the church door, repented—more or less—and was opportunely run over in the street.

It would seem that Ruby's Choice is intended for schoolgirls. For such schoolgirls as like that sort of story it is perhaps not a bad story of the sort. Ruby was a high-spirited young female, educated abroad, and beloved by a very young and rustic English gentleman, and a very thinly varnished Italian cad. She chose the latter, and had cause to regret it, and he became a tragedian, and acted Romeo, and the theatre caught fire, and he was burnt, and she married the rustic. The rustic was a barrister, by the way, and did not know that when a man abandons his wife and child, and after some years demands money from his wife with threats, and her child is stolen, and discovered in the keeping of a disreputable person who cannot, or will not, account for her possession of it, there is a not inappropriate thing called habeas corpus to be had for the asking. Miss Gellie should have consulted Dr. Barnardo, and then have reasoned à fortiori—very much fortiori. At the time when we perused this volume we believed the illustrations to be, upon the whole, the most atrocious that the strange tribe of book illustrators had ever thrust upon an outraged world. We have now abandoned that belief (with regret) for a reason that will presently appear.

Innocencia is a sentimental story, ending sadly, of the loves of two primitive, but passionate, Brazilians. Its interest lies in the circumstance that it is, says Mr. Wells, the "first published English translation of any work of light literature by a Brazilian author." He further asserts that the story in the original Portuguese conveys an extraordinarily vivid and accurate impression of life in the remote and little-frequented backwoods of Brazil. It seems probable that the criticism is accurate, for the translation has enough of these qualities to show that it at least is the work of an able writer. There is hardly any story, and what there is is melancholy. A young Brazilian apothecary and a travelling German entomologist fall in with a prairie farmer, and lodge some time in his house. The apothecary falls vehemently in love with the farmer's beauteous daughter, who warmly reciprocates. The farmer suspects the entomologist of this offence; but the latter does not love, and rides away. There are some comic scenes and some sentimental ones, and then comes the young woman's affianced bridegroom, and the romance ends in general woe.

One seldom meets with an odder or less satisfactory sort of book than The Star of Gezer, the King's Daughter. It begins with descriptions of Solomon, his court, and the Temple, in that most hateful of all styles, imitation of the Authorized Version of the Old Testament. By degrees the author tires of this, and falls upon such phrases as "Solomon loved the young, and delighted in giving them pleasant times." Sometimes a recollection of the horrid vagary with which he set out prompts a phrase like this:—"Let me tell the Princess Zibya whom thou art." The story is a mixture of the Books of Kings and Chronicles, the books of Murray and Baedeker, and the books of Mr. Mudie. Solomon is alleged to have had a daughter Zibya, by "the queen" Valpres, and this Zibya to have fallen in love with one Barzillai, and flirted with him in gardens and corridors as if it had been Belgrave Square, and to have been also beloved by Bar-Shimei (his father threw stones at David!), whose jealousy caused trouble, which all came right in the end. The hotch-potch is even more offensive than the story is dull, and we entertain what seems a not unreasonable hope of never meeting its like again.

Rose Mervyn is a long, thick story with gilt-edged leaves. It appears to be intended for girls. It is also not altogether bad. It is about a family of people who lived in Wales and were pestered by Rebecca riots in the 'forties. The girl is not utterly hateful, though she did go out as a governess. The major who married her is too faultless even for a girl's book. The girl's mother had the most absurd family secret. It was that her father was a lord; and why she took so much pains to conceal it is a thing impossible to understand. So far, however, the book is not remarkable. It is remarkable for Mr. A. Hitchcock's illustrations. They are worse than those in Ruby's Choice, which is a far more awful condemnation than its sounds. They are, moreover, reproduced by perhaps the most complete and faithful process known to art. Whether the men are more appalling than the women, or the horses more ghastly than either, or the children more infamous than any, is a matter for individual taste to decide. But that so many illustrations of such enormous demerit have never before been gathered together in one volume is, we sincerely trust, a fact—though not a very comforting one.

THE interest of Mr. Pater's new volume of essays is increased by the fact that the compositions which it contains range in point of date over an unusually long period. There is some matter here dating as far back as 1865, and some which is of the present twelvemonth. Although it may be presumed that the fact of republication, especially in the case of a writer so careful as Mr. Pater, necessarily implies the other fact of a certain amount of editing or harmonizing, it is almost impossible that this reunion of work, composed at great intervals, should not show development and evolution—processes nowhere more interesting in literature than in the department of criticism.

The book contains ten essays and a postscript, the latter dealing chiefly with the contrast of "Classical" and "Romantic"—a subject on which there is always something new to be said by a fit mouth. The ten essays deal with "Style," "Wordsworth," "Coleridge," "Lamb," "Browne," "Love's Labour's Lost," "Measure for Measure," "Shakspeare's English Kings," "Æsthetic Poetry," and "Dante Gabriel Rossetti." Of these the last two, which are, as far as their main bulk, among the oldest, are, perhaps, likely to be least well received by those too numerous readers who are not ready to make the "historical allowance." The very name "æsthetic"—surely the most unlucky and irrational, except its parallel "metaphysical," which was ever applied to a school of poetry—is equally odious to those who entertain a merely conventional contempt for a fashion which is out of fashion, and to those who cherish the gold and precious stones, while they are quite content to part with the hay and stubble of the structure so called. The essays, too, though they contain some admirable writing and much good criticism (as, for instance, on Rossetti's abuse of the refrain), do not show Mr. Pater at his very best in either respect. Especially, we think, it might be contended—paradoxical as the observation may seem in the case of a writer who has perhaps obtained more admirers by his eulogy of Aucassin et Nicolette than by anything else—that Mr. Pater has never been, and certainly is not now, in full sympathy with mediævalism. He seems to have imbibed—from Michelet, we are inclined to suspect, or it may be from Hugo—the curious notion of gloom, terror, disease, delirium, as being of the essence of Middle-Age life and literature. We have sometimes meditated an historical examination of the origin and growth of this, as we hold, quite unhistorical idea; but there is no room for such an examination here. It is sufficient to say that it seems to us to have taken too strong a hold on Mr. Pater at times, and to have made him forget that the gloomy demon-ridden Middle Ages of La Sorcière and Le Succube and Notre-Dame de Paris are but "dretching of swevens" by students and romancers, while the Middle Ages of the real documents, of the Roman de la Rose and the Great Saint Graal, of the anonymous Pastourelles and the anonymous Fabliaux, are as merry as they are mystical, as full of bright colours and stories and the joy of living as they are of Faith and Form and Fear.

Still, the title "Appreciations" applies excellently to these papers, and also to the earlier articles or chapters ranging from Wordsworth to "Shakspeare's Kings." It is particularly agreeable to find Mr. Pater so intelligently enthusiastic over Love's Labour's Lost. We are not wholly with him in all his Shakspeare criticism; for instance, we cannot commend his commendation of the Germans for discovering in Romeo and Juliet a trilogy of "Sonnet-Aubade-Epithalamium." To us, we confess, this kind of analysis appears wedged in too closely between the purely fantastic and the purely unmeaning. But, after all, Mr. Pater is not himself responsible for it, and his approval of it may be bestowed from a point of view which we do not wholly seize. But one who speaks as he does of Love's Labour's Lost has proved that he has the root of the matter in him. In that charming play the youth—the first sprightly runnings—of the Shakspearian genius appear as they appear nowhere else. There are touches even of his tragedy and his wisdom there—his comedy and his romance are there in their very springtide. Accordingly, no play is a better touchstone, and, if a man cannot like it, he may be sure that, though he may think he likes the maturer and graver things, he does not like them for what is pure Shakspeare in them. We are not so sure that we quite grasp Mr. Pater's exact drift in the companion piece on Measure for Measure. We should have liked to see him justify Isabel (Shakspeare always calls her by the shorter and prettier form when he can) from the quaint perversity which has sometimes found fault with her refusal to save Claudio as sour preciseness. Surely it might have been seen that, on the ethics of Aphrodite as well as on those of Artemis or Pallas, the end could not justify the means. Quia multum amavit may so justify, no doubt; but the don d'amoureux merci can never be given as a mere work of necessity and mercy in the other sense. This refutation of a perversity by a further perversity would have suited Mr. Pater's subtlety of handling well enough, and we make him a present of the suggestion. His Wordsworth essay is valuable precisely because it endeavours to give, and to a great extent succeeds in giving, a view of the kind of poetic pleasure which Wordsworth is fitted to give—a view to which the regulation Wordsworthian seldom cares to act as cicerone, and which, it may be, he is not often well qualified to appreciate even for himself. In the handling of Coleridge we find even truer notes, combined, it is necessary to say, with some not so true. Of these last, we think, is the description of Coleridge as a "typical ennuyé," as of the type of Werther and René and Childe Harold. It is inconsistent, not only with the facts, but with Mr. Pater's own quite true estimate of the facts. Coleridge cried for the absolute; your mere ennuyé does not so much cry for as declare his disappointment because he has not got, or has not enjoyed, the extremely relative. But this essay bears two dates as distant as 1865 and 1880, and we are not certain that Mr. Pater has wholly succeeded in getting the two tubes of his glass, constructed at such different times, to bear quite accurately and together on the object. Yet partly for this very reason the essay is one of the most interesting of all, and contains some of the most engaging aperçus.

The most ambitious, we should suppose, is the first—that on Style. Some wise one has said that an essay on style is a thing which every writer thinks he can do, and which no writer thinks any one else can do for him. This would be to take too harsh a view of our kind. But there are, in fact, few subjects on which it is more difficult to say what will content craftsfellows. We gather from Mr. Pater's treatment that he has aimed, either chiefly or at least among other things, at three objects—to defend a somewhat more ornate style than some of his predecessors have seemed to approve, to advocate the free reception of new phrases and metaphors from the arts and sciences into literature proper, and to argue against too severe a divorce between "form" and "matter." This last argument is a valuable one, though we still think, as against Mr. Pater, that attention to form, almost independently of matter, is a good thing, and one to be inculcated. You cannot be always inditing of a really good matter—the things that have been absolutely and imperatively worth saying in the world's literature would, if collected together, go into an uncommonly small library. But you can always be careful of your form. On this point, however, Mr. Pater would hardly differ with us, and his precept (which he may fairly claim to example by his practice), no doubt, has the advantage of checking hasty and careless production. Perhaps, however, Mr. Pater and some other writers have, in reality, done little more than look at the subject from different standpoints. You may consider, on the one hand, the relations of style to the writer considered as an autonomous artist working merely to please his taste or obey his genius. And you may consider those relations as they exist in the other conditions of a large miscellaneous production, much of it only partially voluntary and much more of the kind in which the matter is rather given to than created, or even selected, by the writer. Perhaps this difference will apply also to Mr. Pater's plea for "poetic" prose. He looks at the exquisite and unquestioned excellence of such prose at its best when it is the spontaneous work of the artist; others have looked at its intolerable and disgusting badness when it is at its worst and commonest. To choke off the sickening nuisance of the quotidian flamboyant and flamboyante it is surely permissible to run the risk of discouraging (there is not much risk, after all; for genius is seldom, if ever, discouraged), at immense intervals and in improbable cases, the possible producer of a new Urn Burial or a new Our Ladies of Sorrow. And so, once more, with that subject of introducing freely into literary use phrases and images from sciences and arts. It is good as an esoteric counsel; it is very dangerous as an advice to the vulgar. Abusus non tollit usum, Mr. Pater may retort, and it does not; but great frequency and extreme badness in the abuse may make the recommendation of the use a perilous one, to be restricted to fit ears.

Mr. Pater, however, himself no doubt aims at no others, and to such his own writing is always agreeable, and always instructive. If he at any time seems to underlie the reproach which he not unjustly addresses to Coleridge, of taking things too seriously, the things are never things unworthy to be so taken. And throughout his work, both in form and matter, there exists the quality of this defect—if defect it be. No man of letters in the present day yields to the besetting sin of the present day in all matters—the sin of haste—so little as Mr. Pater. Nor is it any disparagement of his merit that he exemplifies the Retired Leisure of our older University system. How many persons who might set the same example do those Universities still maintain, and how many do set it? How many are there who in other ways might cultivate the Muses with due ceremony, and, as a matter of fact, huddle out their literary work as unceremoniously as any hack-writer? Now Mr. Pater has never condescended to this rage for book-making, and thanks we must him for that. He could hardly, in any case, have written what was not worth reading; but his actual methods have made the worth sure.

THAT there is room for a short history of this country from the earliest times to the Norman Conquest will, we think, be generally allowed by those who are conversant with such matters. Excellent as it is in many respects, Professor Freeman's Old English History does not quite give us what is wanted; for though it certainly contains a brief and not particularly satisfactory summary of the Roman Conquest, it virtually begins with the invasion of the Angles and Saxons, as though the earlier dwellers in our island were nothing to us, while certain peculiarities of style and treatment, on which we need not enter here, may also, perhaps, be held to detract from its merit as a book for general reading; indeed it was, it should be said, originally intended for children. Besides, since its publication a good deal of labour has been carried on in the same field, both by the late J. R. Green and by other students who have more or less built upon the foundation laid in his two latest and best books. A new book, therefore, on the history of Britain and the early history of England of moderate size, and written in a fairly interesting manner, would deserve to be greeted warmly, provided it was either the fruit of independent research, or was at least written by an author of sufficient learning to be able to present in a popular form the present state of knowledge with regard to his subject. In his preface to the book before us the Rev. A. J. Church, while telling us that he has "consulted with great advantage several of the volumes included in the Rolls series," makes no pretence to anything which can be called research; indeed, he owns, truly enough, that he owes far more to the works of Professor Freeman and Mr. Green than his references indicate, and that he is also indebted to other writers, such as Lappenberg, whose name he should have learnt to spell, and certain contributors to the Dictionary of National Biography. We therefore opened his volume expecting to find the work of experts used to the best advantage; for he can tell a story well when he has it in him to tell, as may be seen by some of the tales which he has written for young people. For some reason or other, however—possibly because he found his subject somewhat strange to him—this "Story" of his lacks interest. The space allotted to it is so small that it would probably be impossible to make it interesting, except by adopting a broad system of treatment, by skilful arrangement, and by exercising great care as regards proportion. All this, however, needs considerable knowledge of the matter to be dealt with.

With the texts of the Roman and Greek authors who describe the Roman conquest of Britain, Mr. Church is, of course, well acquainted; but he does not seem to have taken much advantage of the light which modern scholars have thrown upon what they say. It is certainly surprising to find him accepting the old-fashioned notion that the Cassiterides signified the Scilly Isles, or, as he vaguely puts it, the "region" of Cornwall. Diodorus is plain as to the distinction between the tin found in the Cassiterides, "off the coast of Iberia," and that produced in Britain; and the error repeated here has been so thoroughly exposed by (among others) Mr. Elton, in his Origins of English History—we find nothing which leads us to believe that Mr. Church has consulted this fascinating and scholarly book—that it should have died out by this time. A note throwing doubt on the theory that Cæsar crossed the Thames at Coway Stakes seems to imply that the author is unacquainted with Dr. Guest's interesting paper, first published in the Archæological Institute's Journal, vol. xxiii., and the impression is strengthened by his suggestion that the river crossed by Aulus Plautius, after receiving the submission of the "Boduni" (Dobunni), was probably the Medway. If he had studied Professor Rhys's learned little book, Celtic Britain, where a certain article by Dr. Hübner is quoted, he would have seen that his difficulty as to the identity of the "Boduni" is capable of a rational solution. His treatment of one or two well-known British names is open to objection. Caractacus, though the middle "c" is certainly superfluous, is a form which must be very near the name borne by the King, and is, besides, consecrated by universal usage, and nothing is gained by translating it into Caradoc. Worse still is his change of Cassivelaunus, a name with an instructive meaning, into the foolish form Caswallon. When he comes to the question, "What did the Romans leave in Britain?" he makes no mention of Christianity, and we are told nothing of the story of St. Alban—perhaps because the name was unfortunately omitted in the Dictionary of National Biography—though the martyrdom rests on very fair historical authority, of the Pelagian heresy, or of the visits of St. Germanus. Indeed, until some references to British Christians necessarily occur in the account of the mission of St. Augustine—of whose consecration, by the way, we find no notice—the uninstructed reader might believe that no such persons ever existed. A like neglect meets us with respect to English ecclesiastical history, and we have positively searched in vain for any mention of the Synod of Whitby, or any fact bearing on the triumph of Rome over Iona. Of Wilfrid we are only told that he was a Northern bishop, who converted the South Saxons during his banishment; we are not told why he was banished, or anything about his appeals to Rome. Even the name of Archbishop Theodore is not so much as mentioned. On the other hand, considering the size of the book, too much space is devoted to the reign of Alfred, and far too much to the dreary details of Danish ravages. The leading events of the conquest of Britain and the settlement of the Jutes, Angles, and Saxons are, for the most part, carefully taken, at least so it seems to us, from Green's Conquest of England; but the narrow space into which they are crowded renders the narrative somewhat dreary. Mr. Church would have done wisely if he had followed Green in keeping clear of Arthur; we cannot quite make out whether he believes that Arthur fought at Mount Badon, and we are sure that Green did not teach him to place the site of the battle "near Bath." In the chapter headed "The English People" we have an attempt to give an account of the political institutions of the English, and of the ranks and classes into which they were divided, in about five pages. The result can scarcely, even allowing for exigencies of space, be held to be an adequate representation of what is now common knowledge as to these matters. The statement that the "eorl was the chief man of the village," and the weak paragraph which follows it, seems to imply that the title was to some extent official; but both here and elsewhere there is a want of precision which makes it hard to say what the author really means, and, at the same time, betrays a hasty reading up of a new subject. Mr. Church's knowledge of Tacitus should have saved him from the suggestion that the distinction between the eorls and the ceorls may be accounted for by supposing that the eorls came from the earlier and the ceorls from the later settlers. Nothing can well be more certain than that the invaders brought over with them the threefold division of ranks, not reckoning slaves, which existed among them in their old homes. A strange confusion is made between the origin of thegnhood as an institution, and the means by which a thegn attained his rank and the characteristics of his position. We are told that the thegns were the immediate followers of the king, were "raised to the rank they bore" for services to him, and formed a "non-hereditary nobility." The king must have had a long tail if it included, say in the tenth century, all who had attained thegnhood, nor does it appear clear how he could have been served by all men who grew rich enough to have their five hides of land, or to fare thrice over sea at their own charges, and so became of "thegn-right worthy," nor does the non-hereditary principle seem exactly consistent with the fact that the third generation of holders of five hides became "gesithcund" or thegn-born; for the two terms seem to have come to mean much the same thing, if they were not always exactly equivalent. Another remarkable statement in these five pages concerns the witenagemot, which we are told became as time went on "more and more representative." It was never, of course, either more or less representative, being at all times a primary assembly. We imagine, however, that Mr. Church knows this, and really meant that when a body of retainers or other freemen was present at one of the meetings of the witan, they are in some cases at least described in some such phrase as tota populi generalitas. But our business here is with what he says, and not with what he may or may not have meant to say.

As far as his narrative is concerned he is generally correct, for he keeps pretty close to his modern guides, importing now and then scraps from the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle or William of Malmesbury. In spite, however, of his guides, whose opinions he is apt to echo, apparently without any independent thought, he has managed to fall into some blunders about matters of fact. For example, he tells us that Archbishop Odo, "after pronouncing the marriage of Edwy and Elgiva to be void, came over to the new King." If he had consulted Kemble's Codex Diplomaticus, or even the Dictionary of National Biography, which he seems to have used for some part of this period, he would have learnt otherwise. The matter is not a mere trifling detail, it has an important bearing on Edwy's position. A more delightful blunder appears in his solemn comment on Tostig's misgovernment of Northumbria. "It was," he says, "a dangerous experiment to put a pure-bred Englishman from the South to administer the affairs of a half-Danish earldom." This is, we are sure, a perfectly original remark, and Heaven forbid that we should deprive Mr. Church of the full glory to be derived from it; indeed, we shall never cease to connect it with his name. At the same time we venture, just as an illustration of the way in which he seems to us to have worked, to put forward our idea of the genesis of this memorable comment. References to the Norman Conquest made during the course of putting his compilation together must have supplied him with frequent descriptions of Harold as the "last of our native Kings," and the like, and so it was perfectly natural that he, knowing nothing about the matter, should jump to the conclusion that Harold and his brothers, the sons of a Danish lady, the nephews of a Danish jarl, the grandsons of Thurgils Sprakaleg, were pure-bred Englishmen. Nevertheless this theory of ours, which we protest has not been made in any envious spirit, must not, as we have said, be used to rob Mr. Church of the gratification which he must feel, and the renown which he deserves to attain, as the sole and undoubted discoverer of this new fact relating to the illustrious family of Godwin, and the troubles of 1065. Besides distinct errors, we have found a larger crop of misprints in his book than we ever remember in one of anything like the same size. We noted a dozen and then gave up. Most of them are in names, Edwy being printed for Edwin, and so on, and argue some want of familiarity on the author's part with his subject. In giving the verse which Canute is said to have made about the monks of Ely, Mr. Church says that "the letters peculiar to Old English have been changed to their modern equivalents." Five obvious misprints occur in the four lines, and Do can scarcely be allowed to pass as equivalent to Da. As we always avoid, if possible, saying strong things in dispraise of any one's work, we shall sum up our review of Early Britain by simply expressing our conviction that it is not exactly the kind of book which we believe is wanted on its subject.

A LOG-BOOK AND BOOK OF RECOLLECTIONS.*

MR. BOWLES dedicates his Log-book to "Captain Weenie," a little girl of his own, who was no doubt charming, and whose funny sayings and doings on board the yacht must have diverted the crew almost as much as they delighted her father and family. But baby stories, however laughable in themselves, are apt to weary readers who only know the infant phenomenon in print. The public at large will not smile much when Weenie drops her "golly golly into the lawter," or when she punishes her dog for the purely imaginary offence of saying such ugly words as "pig" and "beast." There are certain newspapers and magazines in the United States which purvey a foison of stories of this kind. The Americans are a newer people than we are. Perhaps they are less sophisticated, and like that sort of thing.

Mr. Bowles contributed much, if not all, of his log-book to the Vanity Fair newspaper. His style is smart and lively, and his observations on the persons he met and the sights he saw are often shrewd and sensible. Alison on Taste is perhaps, nowadays, an almost forgotten book. But there is more than one traveller who would do well to study its nearly obsolete pages before he decides what to retain in his published journals, and what to expunge from them. Among other things the observations on poor Smiler's burial in the Holy Land would have been better omitted.

Mr. Bowles inspected many yachts, as, we fear, most seagoing travellers have to do, before he found one suited to his mind. And even then he does not claim for his purchase the absolute perfection which most sailors find in their own particular "hooker." "I could have improved her," he says. "I never saw the man or woman I could not have done that to." And so he and his family went on board, and a right merry party they seem to have been. Cowes was "deserted and melancholy" on the 1st of August, 1888. By-the-bye, Mr. Bowles laughs at the idea of the Royal Yacht Club nowadays calling itself the Royal Yacht Squadron, and he gives good reasons for his mirth. At Dieppe he had occasion to remark that the French pilotage system is as absurd as our own. He could not see the logic of the règlement (though we all know the French to be a severely logical people) which requires you to take a pilot on board when you do not require one, and which declines to send you one when you most need his services. By an easy transition his reflections on this subject lead him into a dissertation on toleration. And he hits the blot when he says that the modern indifferentism which shelters itself under the higher sounding name is really "a confession of ignorance or miscreance." He says that the attitude of these so-called tolerationists is this:—"We really none of us know anything, and we none of us really believe anything; hence what you pretend to know and believe is just as good as what we pretend to know and believe. Wherefore, we will tolerate you. Let us all go to the Devil our own way." Off Algiers one day Mr. Bowles asked his cook if they had any preserved fish on board. "Well, sir, there's some tins in the locker marked 'Fins.' I don't know what they are." These turned out to be haricots verts fins. Mr. Bowles is an enthusiast for the Turkish bath. And we think that he is right to be so; but when he says that we have two lessons to learn from the East—"dignity and cleanliness"—we recall stories which we used to read of the occupation in which the great Algerian chief Abd-el-Kader (cited by many folks as a model of Mahometan fine gentleman) was engaged when he sat up, or rather down, in state to receive English visitors.

It is hurtful to our national pride to be told by so competent an authority as Mr. Bowles what we have heard lately from many sources, that most merchant shippers have given up the "turbulent, drunken, untrustworthy English merchant sailor," and man their ships with Maltese, Greeks, Arabs, Italians, or Scandinavians. "The British merchant sailor has rendered it impossible to employ him." On the other hand, there is no kind of man at all who is better or better behaved in these days than the British sailor of the Royal Navy.

There is an amusing story of a high-born Arab gentleman's contempt for the fellaheen of Egypt, to whom he denied the right to call themselves Arabians, and who, he said, were "mere sons of Crusaders."

Mr. Bowles thinks fit to ridicule the pretension of the Jews to consider Jerusalem their own peculiar city. They only possessed it, he says, for five hundred years, just as the English once held possession of France. He maintains that the Jews in Jerusalem and Englishmen in France were only foreign invaders, conquerors, and settlers. Both were after a considerable period expelled, and neither have any claim, legal or moral, to the country they once held, but subsequently failed to keep. This view of the question is at variance with the opinion generally entertained throughout Christendom. The English had no Divine command to occupy Guienne or to inhabit Picardy.

Our yachtsman thinks that, in return for the 400,000*l.* which Protestant missionaries have expended in proselytization among the Jews in the Holy Land, they cannot show five grown up, bona-fide, honest converts. Slavery even in Egypt must have some attractions for the people. Mr. Bowles knew of an Egyptian slave who had emancipated himself by taking refuge in a British man-of-war. As Curran says, he might there "have stood free and erect as a man." But he leaped overboard, and swam back to his master. He preferred his serfdom at home to liberty on board an English man-of-war.

The practical lesson to be learned from Mr. Bowles's book is one which we are glad to be taught. It is that yachting is not a pastime reserved for the wealthy. Treat your ship as your home, and your house on shore as a luxury which you may well do without, and you will find that "you can live with every comfort, travel with every luxury attainable out of England," with a family of three adults and four children, for 180*l.* a month. On board a P. and O. steamer it would cost you at least 246*l.* per mensem.

Cicero tells us that "senilis stultitia quæ deliratio appellari solet, senum levium est, non omnium." Certainly it is not an attribute of Mr. Adolphus Trollope. His old age

And lovely as a Lapland night.

True that he is garrulous. But what is pleasanter than the garrulity of a happy octogenarian who can still see that the earth is green, and that the sky is blue, and who can say of so many a great one who has gone from us, Vidi tantum? He has not only lived long, but has seen much of the world, and can tell us from his own knowledge what Emerson was like, Charles Lever and Matthew Arnold, and Jenny Lind and Liszt, and the Princess Alice. When he speaks to us of his own personal doings and feelings, his audience likes to listen because he never listens, as the French say, to himself. He never studies how to shape his sentences. He never poses as a hero. There is a noble simplicity in his mode of telling us of his happiness in his first marriage, of the loneliness which possessed him when he lost his wife, and how happy he became once more when he married his present wife. We like to hear him talk of those two accomplished women. Many of our readers will feel something more than commiseration, a very living sympathy sprung from acquaintance and friendship with the brilliant subject of his sorrow, when he lost his only child who had just become a mother. He bears his sorrows with the cheerfulness which Emerson tells us is one of the chief characteristics of greatness. He feels the blow and bows to it, but it never fells him. He tells us that he has had plenty of troubles. And, no doubt, he has. Few men live to nearly eighty without them. But, like the French philosopher, "il couvre de la main gauche les plaies de son cœur, et lutte avec la droite contre les difficultés de la vie." Montaigne is hardly less methodical than Mr. Trollope. He begins to talk on one subject, and his full mind breaks off to talk of something else which happened perhaps fifty years before, or a thousand miles distant from the scene of his first anecdote. We must follow suit. It is not for us to arrange the stories according to the unities. We take things as they come. Now we mourn with him over the decay of coffee-making in Paris, where at most cafés and hotels the decoction is as bad as the "disappointed Briton can have left at home." We smile with him, for we are sure that he did not frown, when a French stationmaster assured him that the train was late, "à cause de marche lente." We wince with him when the guide at Waterloo told him that his (Mr. Trollope's) mother, whom he remembered thirty-three years before, was "une femme bien embêtante." We share the disappointment which, as a reader of Tristram Shandy, he must have felt at finding the nuns of the Béguinage at Ghent ill-favoured and stupid-looking. We open our eyes in unison with him when the gentleman at Soest showed him the veritable church spire to which Baron Munchausen had fastened his horse's bridle in a snowstorm. We fancy that we are less credulous than he is of the clairvoyance of Mlle. Julie, who knew all about Mrs. Harris's teeth better than the lady herself. N.B. Mrs. Harris is not a myth this time, she is the wife of the late Bishop of Gibraltar. We envy his opportunity of becoming a house and land-owner in Savona in exchange for a pair of old trousers. "Mr. Gladstone has said that Italy has not an enemy in the world." Mr. Trollope knows the Italians, he says, even better than the ex-Premier knows them. He thinks, or, at any rate, they think, that France is very decidedly their enemy. We have not space to quote Mr. Trollope's ghost stories, and we can only allude to one of his anecdotes of dogs. A great friendship existed between two large dogs, one of whom was French and the other English. One day, however, when they were attacked by, and were having a free fight with, a quantity of other dogs, the Frenchman slunk away, leaving the plucky Briton to finish the battle alone. Eric (such was our country dog's name) could never be induced to acknowledge his French friend again. To paraphrase the remark of Sydney Smith, we should like to hear the French dog's version. The story of Mrs. Edwards offending the author in his early youth, by giving him nothing for dinner but a rice-pudding, is most amusingly told, and has an excellent sequel. Mr. Trollope shares the opinion of a gentleman, formerly well known in London society, that cream is the best and only beverage to be drunk as an accompaniment to a cigar. He was struck in the Pays de Vaud by seeing a peasant woman who worked in the field with a dung-cart who entertained professors at her cottage, and subscribed to a circulating library at the nearest town. Has Mr. Trollope never heard of the hedge-scholars in Ireland? Only this summer we saw a clergyman in Kent who told us that one of his hoppers, a most ragged specimen of an Irish peasant, conversed with him in Ciceronian Latin. Of Clarendon it may be, as Lord Byron says, "the birthplace of sweet love"; but, according to our remembrancer, it is still more decidedly the birthplace of sour wine. We wish that we had time to tell our readers the true story of "Old Booty" being flung into the burning crater of Mount Vesuvius. It is our author's opinion that mountain-climbing should be limited to the region of wood. "Climb," he says, "as high as the firs climb, and no higher." There are two delightful stories of children which we must also leave our readers to look out for themselves. One of them is about a boy who was radiant with delight because his father could not scold or thrash him any more because he was "railed in." The other is of an urchin of eight years old whose mother found out the secret of his life. What that secret was we shall not reveal. The French version of the English joke that the question whether life is worth living depends on the liver strikes us as being particularly neat. Across the Channel they say that it is all a "question de foi (foie)." We are given a capital specimen of American cuteness in the anecdote of the journalist who persuaded the Pope to let him wire his allocution to New York before it had been made public in Europe, and to get one of the Cardinals to translate it into English for him. On the question of the Roman malarious fever Mr. Trollope gives some curious information. It was unknown in the Ghetto, which was thickly inhabited by a dirty and very squalid population; while it rages on the Campagna, most parts of which are very dry, and the whole district very sparsely peopled. The Trappists at Tre Fontane largely improved the climatic conditions of the place by thick plantations of eucalyptus. The monks, indeed, made a liqueur from the eucalyptus leaves, which they professed to consider a sovereign remedy against malarious fever. We regret to say that on one occasion Mr. Trollope so far forgot himself as to act the part of a footpad, committing robbery as well as assault; but as he assures us that he has "abstained from highway robbery from that time to this," and as the crime was committed many years ago, we are content to apply to it the statute of limitations, if such a statute exists in reference to such offences. The conversion into marble of the human body by Signor Marini must be a very curious and perhaps interesting process, but we do not think that we should greatly care to see it. At Leukerbad, where the patients are amphibious and spend half of their lives in the water, our author was amused by one of the rules which was added by a wag to the printed regulations. "Il est strictement défendu d'agacer les baigneurs avec des cannes et parapluies et de jeter nourriture dans les bains." In spite of chronological evidence on the other side, we are so utterly convinced of Mr. Trollope's perennial youth, that we confidently expect to greet him once more as a candidate for public favour. We shall do so as heartily as we now (for a time) wish him farewell.

EGYPT AS A WINTER RESORT.*

THERE is every justification for the appearance of this little book, which will supply a distinct need, and should take a high place as a worthy model for makers of handbooks to health and pleasure resorts. For invalids of many types the climate of Egypt has long been recognized as remarkably helpful, and the wealthy have been frequently advised by their doctors to winter in Cairo. But till recent years Egypt has had many drawbacks for invalids, both on account of the expense of living there and of the too foreign surroundings. Since the English immigration thither from 1882 onwards, objections on these scores have had far less weight. It is now possible for people, even of moderate means, to enjoy the light and warmth and dryness of the Egyptian winter in the midst of good society and the comforts of civilization. The avowed object of the book before us is to inform English and American doctors what kind of patients ought and ought not to be sent to Egypt. This object is attained by means of clear statements, without any tendency to that special pleading which usually mars books of this nature by medical authors, and the work contains besides much information which will be useful and interesting to all who may visit Egypt apart from the purpose of health-seeking.

All who know modern Cairo and its surroundings well will recognize the correctness of the claims Mr. Sandwith makes for its climatic and social advantages. It is pre-eminently a place where invalids who can enjoy an English summer, with its pleasures, may find a continuation of such enjoyment during the winter months till summer nearly comes again, and they will gain, in addition, as the author says, "that interest and relaxation of mind inspired in a country where the remains may be studied of the ancient Egyptians, Persians, Greeks, Romans, Arabs, and Turks." It is far too much the custom of physicians to think only of the climatic qualities of the resort they recommend, ignoring entirely the social and intellectual needs of the patients they expatriate for months. The mistake becomes one of great magnitude with the very class of patients who would be most benefited by such a climate as that of Egypt—namely, those who are not the subjects of advanced or disabling disease. Send such people to any of the numerous health resorts where the society is dull and there is nothing to stimulate the intellect or imagination, and the result too often is that the unoccupied mind is driven in upon itself, and the body refuses to react to whatever climatic charm there may be. Cairo, with all its old associations, and its refined English society at the present time, is almost an ideal place for many patients whose physical needs are best served by the influence of plenty of fresh air, light, and warmth without wet. The days can always be spent out of doors, and no night air colder than 55° Fahr. will be breathed, even without any artificial heat, provided the windows be closed at sunset. One other point may be noticed on behalf of Cairo as a health resort, which strikes every visitor, and is of the highest moment—the absence of dying consumptives. These find Egypt too far from home, and in the more enlightened medical practice of the day are now rarely sent so far. In Cairo they are scarcely to be seen.

An interesting feature of this book is a short calendar giving the weather characteristics of the several months in Cairo, with the arrivals of the migratory birds, and the order of appearance of ripe fruits and flowers. Information as to the facilities of travel to the various places of most frequent resort is given in a very readable form. Those who have not been to Egypt in recent years will notice with gratification that there is now a first-class hotel at the foot of the Pyramids, enabling people to enjoy the pure air and quiet of the desert in comfort and good surroundings.

A careful perusal of this book forces us to credit Mr. Sandwith with accuracy as a guide, exceptional modesty as a medical author, and success as a literary workman.

CHINESE LANGUAGE AND PORCELAIN.†

THE study of Chinese is rapidly passing from the unscientific stage when the learner was content to place himself unreservedly in the hands of his native "Siensheng," to the surer ground of grammatical analysis, by means of which the student is able to make himself master of the intricacies of the language, and to assure himself of the interpretation of texts. In the absence of certain guides to a knowledge of the language, the earlier students were compelled to trust to their native teachers both for the explanation of Chinese documents and for the translation of English letters into Chinese. No interpreter at the Consulates even dreamed of translating a Chinese paper without the help of his "Teacher," or of writing a Chinese letter for himself. And the result has been that a race of men has grown up with considerable colloquial knowledge of the language, but with nothing beyond a mere smattering of its literary styles.

Julien was the first who reduced the classical language to an accurate grammatical system, and it was from his work—La syntaxe nouvelle de la langue chinoise—that Dr. Hirth got his first insight into the structure of the language.

It seemed to him at the time that, under the guidance of this ingenious work, he had learned more of the real spirit of the language in a few weeks than had been the case in as many months during which he was left to his own imagination in pursuing his studies by mere practice, and that the benefits thus derived, in respect of the ancient written language, might be brought to bear with greater advantage to the practical student on the modern documentary style.

To the uninitiated it may be necessary to explain that there is as wide a difference between the classical and documentary styles of Chinese as there is between ancient and modern Greek, and that the documentary style is no more like the spoken language than Chaucer's is like the colloquial of the present day. Julien's work, therefore, could hardly be held to apply to the documentary style, and the present work is consequently a new departure.

Chinese being an uninflected language, the grammar consists mainly of syntax, and the construction of a sentence should, therefore, be the principal object of study. This Dr. Hirth points out, and he lays down with admirable plainness the rules which govern the arrangement of words in a sentence. As an illustration of his remarks, he shows that, while in Chinese, as in English, it is necessary to express such a sentence, for example, as "The son beats the father" by words in this order, it may be rendered into Latin by "Filius verberat patrem," "Patrem verberat filius," "Verberat patrem filius," or "Verberat filius patrem," without being misunderstood. But it is obvious that, for the expression of all but the simplest sentences, auxiliary words and particles must be supplied; and in the documentary style of Chinese these are largely used, and must be thoroughly understood before the contents of a despatch or a letter can be made plain. Of these words Dr. Hirth gives a full list, and illustrates their uses by numerous and well-chosen examples.

Fortunately, though a Chinese despatch is full of these and other difficulties, the love of precedent, which is so prominent a characteristic of the people, has induced Chinese scribes to adopt stereotyped forms for every kind of document. Thus every despatch and every letter is drafted on well-recognized models. The same phrases occur over and over again, and the same turns of expression are common to all. Most of these are explained by Dr. Hirth, whose work needs but the full annotated text of a model despatch to make it a very complete guide to documentary Chinese.

In his brochure on ancient porcelain, also, Dr. Hirth follows in the footsteps of Professor Julien, with the contents of whose well-known work on the subject he is in accord, with the exception of the date at which porcelain was first manufactured, and of the colour of céladons. Julien supposes that the art was invented between the years 185 B.C. and A.D. 87, on the authority of a passage in an historical work in which mention is made of yao, a term which is now commonly applied to the various classes of chinaware. But Chinese literature is full of such pitfalls. The belief that gunpowder was in use in China hundreds of years before it was known in that country was based on the occurrence of a word in the early annals of the Empire, which then meant a catapult, but which is now used to designate a cannon. In the same way, at the time of which Julien speaks, yao was applied to pottery of any kind, and not to chinaware, as it is at the present day. This being acknowledged, it is obvious that the date fixed by Dr. Hirth for the invention of the art—namely, the beginning of the seventh century A.D.—is the one which is more surely attested by the evidence of native works of authority.

As to the colour of céladons, Dr. Hirth points out that the word Ts'ing, which Julien translated "blue," means also "light green," "the green of sprouting plants," &c. The same confusion occurs in connexion with these two colours in most languages of antiquity—e.g. in the instance of γλαυκός, which suggests precisely the same uncertainty as the word Ts'ing. In this case, however, Julien might have been guided to the right shade intended by the fact that the colour of céladons is frequently likened by Chinese authors to that of jade, which is certainly not blue. But Dr. Hirth has much more to say about céladons than their colour, and his work throws a most useful and interesting light both on the manufacture of ancient porcelain and on the trade routes by which specimens of the ware were carried into Central and Western Asia.

SIR ALFRED LYALL'S VERSE.*

THESE verses of Sir Alfred Lyall's owe, with few exceptions, a double debt of parentage to the country whose name they bear on their title-page. India is their place of origin in more senses than one; for they have most of them been written, not only in India, but on Indian subjects. Shall we add at once that, what is true of most of them is true of all the best of them, and that Sir Alfred Lyall's Muse is evidently a divinity of Oriental extraction, who declines to inspire him, or at any rate to the full measure of afflatus, unless when sought by him on her native soil? Certainly the author's translations from Horace, his "Land of Regrets," and, in general we may say the lighter exercises of his undoubted talent as a verse-writer, form by far the least striking portion of the contents of this little volume. Sir Alfred Lyall is much more at home among incidents of the Mutiny, or reminiscences of yet earlier events of Anglo-Indian history. He can enter with true imaginative power into the feelings of the wild tribesmen of the North-West Frontier, of the border warriors upon whose frays and feuds the pax Britannica has imposed an unwelcome armistice, and the swart moss-troopers who find their occupation gone under our Imperial rule. One of the most stirring of his lays is that of the "Old Pindaree," an aged robber "rider," condemned to wear out the evening of his days in the despised and detested arts of peace, and lamenting the days of his adventurous youth in a strain in which pride, pathos, and a certain grim humour are very artistically and effectively blended. The same note is struck again in "A Rajpoot Chief of the Old School," only that here the pathetic predominates, and the dying warrior accepts the change of times with more dignity and resignation:—

The English say I govern ill,
That laws must silence spear and gun,
So may my peaceful subjects till;
But peaceful subjects have I none.
I can but follow my fathers' rule,
I cannot learn in an English school.
Yet the hard world softens, and change is best;
My sons must leave the ancient ways.
The folk are weary, the land shall rest;
And the gods are kind, for I end my days.

Then carry me to my castle steep,
Whose time is ending with its lord's.
Eight months my grandsire held the keep
Against the fierce Maratha hordes.
It would not stand three winter suns
Against the shattering English guns
And so these rude old faithful stones.
My fathers' haven in high war-tide,
Must rive and moulder—as soon my bones
Must bleach on the holy river-side.

Years hence, when all the earth is calm
And forts are level and foes agree,
Since feuds must end, to trade and farm
And toil, like oxen, patiently;
When this my garden palace stands
A desert ruin, choked with sands,
A broken well 'mid trees that fade,
Some traveller still my name may bless,
The chief long syne that left him shade
And a water spring in the wilderness.

A "haven" is perhaps a more effective protection against a storm than against a "tide"; but we will not be hypercritical in judging of an excellently well-sustained piece of poetic portraiture.

It is not only with native Indian life in its wilder and more picturesque aspects that Sir Alfred Lyall is in sympathy. The profoundly reflective side of the Oriental mind appeals to him no less forcibly, and his feeling for it finds admirable expression in the "Meditations of a Hindu Prince," and in "The Hindu Ascetic." This, the shorter of the two poems, is perhaps the more striking. The four brief stanzas of which it is composed give us the very spirit of that East which, in Mr. Matthew Arnold's fine quatrain, "bowed low before the blast In patient deep disdain," which "let the legions thunder past, And plunged in thought again." There is, indeed, something more than a reminiscence of Mr. Arnold in the closing stanza, where the musing Indian quietist asks himself when these phantoms of Western rule "shall flicker away Like the smoke of the guns on the wind-swept hill, Like the sounds and colours of yesterday, And the soul have rest, and the air be still." In the companion piece, the picture of the Mussulman, "civil and mild," who stands watching the English at their game of Badminton under the battered wall of Delhi, while the execration of Islam on the infidel rises with Heinesque suddenness to his smiling lips, Sir Alfred Lyall shows that he cherishes no illusions as to the volcanic hatreds which underlie the placid-looking crust of Moslem submission to the rule of the Feringee in India. "Theology in Extremis" is a powerful, but not perhaps an entirely successful, attempt to realize the emotions of a young English Gallio who has been offered his life by the Mussulman sepoys on condition of his repeating the formula of the Mahomedan faith, and who, without any definite belief in his own professed creed, or any expectation of post-mortem reward for his constancy, rejects the offer from a sense of patriotic pride, and a sort of half-consciousness that to renounce his national religion to save his life would be closely akin to repudiating his temporal allegiance to his sovereign for the same purpose. The situation of this voluntary martyr, who lacks the superhuman support by which martyrdom is commonly fortified, has undoubtedly high dramatic possibilities and psychological significance, which Sir Alfred Lyall, however, has hardly succeeded in developing. Another poem of a more distinctly European character is that entitled "Retrospection," the narrative of a dramatic incident, the scene of which is also laid in the Mutiny, its characters consisting of a Colonel whose regiment has "risen," the Colonel's wife, and the lady's lover. The lover and the lady wish to fly; the husband insists on remaining to face the mutineers; and contention is rising high between them when an opportune shot lays the Colonel low, and lover and lady gallop somewhat unromantically away. Who fired that shot "the mute trees know," the author tells us. They have the advantage of the reader, who is left to guess—a mistake, we think, in point of art, since we have at least a right to know whether the hero even of the shortest drama is a murderer or not. In pieces of this kind, however, Sir Alfred Lyall is not seen at his best. It is when he speaks through the lips of one of those Orientals whom he knows so well that we read him with the greatest pleasure. Then he is always natural and unforced, and not infrequently powerful and impressive in a high degree.

THE publication of the third volume of Mr. Bradley's Dictionary of Miniaturists puts an end, at least for the present, to a work which it will still take a great deal of labour to make anything like complete. The difficulties of making an exhaustive list of miniaturists and scribes has probably deterred many others from undertaking the task; and Mr. Bradley may, at least, be complimented on his courage in grappling with it, and his patience and industry in carrying it so far. Of its incompleteness Mr. Bradley is his own witness. Although he has at length arrived at the letter Z, such an abundance of new material has reached him in the course of his journey, that it takes nearly five closely-printed and double-columned pages to print a list of names not included in the body of the book. To these a very great many more would have to be added before all the existing, and even easily available, material was exhausted; but we may well be content with what we have got, and may give a guarded assent to Mr. Bradley's opinion that it is not likely that very many names of the highest rank are overlooked. At all events, Mr. Bradley has shown that he thoroughly understands what such a book ought to be, and there appear to have been some circumstances, not entirely under his control, which have prevented him from attaining his ideal of perfection. In form and design, for instance, this Dictionary may be taken as a model. The size is handy, the type clear and good, and all authorities quoted are given with "chapter and verse." In scope it is, if anything, too comprehensive. It is, no doubt, difficult to draw the line, as illumination and early miniature-painting grew so directly out of calligraphy, and tended so surely to the miniature portrait-painters of the present century; but yet we are inclined to think it would have been wiser to have stopped at the point when "miniatures" became altogether detached from manuscripts, and to have left calligraphy alone after writing had been completely superseded by printing. The later portrait-painters in little are already included in dictionaries of painters, and it was surely useless to encumber the book with such notices as that of Staffen, a calligrapher who published at Leipzig a book "containing various handwritings" in the year 1749, or that of George Shelley, the Writing Master of Christ's Hospital, in the seventeenth century. On the other hand, the articles on patrons of art and calligraphy, though not coming within the title of the work, are distinctly valuable and appropriate, as it is only through their names that some of the finest specimens of calligraphy and illumination can be indexed in such a dictionary. Some of the most interesting articles in the present volume are of this kind, as those on the Orleans and Sforza families, and we are not sure that in any future work of the kind, or any new edition of this, that it would not be well to insert articles on places where valuable manuscripts are preserved.

But a book must be judged, not only by its design, but its execution; and, whatever classes of artists are introduced, they should be dealt with thoroughly. The plea that not many names of importance have been overlooked is scarcely valid in the case of a work which aims at the reputation of a cyclopædia. Unimportant names may be paradoxically said to be of the first importance in such a case; for there is seldom lack of sources of information about distinguished persons in any walk of life. It may have been a mistake, for instance, to have included the miniature portrait-painters of the last century or so; but, if introduced at all, the roll should have been as complete as possible. Some excuse may be made for the meagreness of his list of these, as till lately the subject had been much neglected; and the fine exhibition of miniatures at the Burlington Fine Arts Club this year probably came too late for the information in the Catalogue to be utilized for Mr. Bradley's Dictionary. It must, however, be remembered that most of the information in this Catalogue was contained in Dr. Propert's large work on the subject, to which Mr. Bradley refers. We are certain that, if the Catalogue had been in Mr. Bradley's hands sooner, he would have seen the necessity of including a large number of names which he has omitted. If we confine ourselves only to the initials of the third volume of this Dictionary—namely, O to Z—we find that Mr. Bradley includes only fifteen out of about one hundred artists named in the Catalogue, and specimens of miniatures by nearly all the latter were exhibited in Savile Row.

Out of these names there are not many perhaps of the highest class; but there are several of some importance, and few if any which ought to be omitted in a Dictionary of Miniaturists so wide in scope as that of Mr. Bradley. Jean Tontin, for instance, was not so great an artist as Petitot père, but still he was important as the inventor of the process of enamel painting, which was carried to perfection by Petitot. Zincke is, of course, included by Mr. Bradley, but not André Rouquet, his Swiss follower. Sir Henry Raeburn is certainly a name of importance, and should have been included; for, though he is better known by his larger works, the same might be said of the Van Eycks, Zuccherro, and several other artists whom Mr. Bradley inserts. In some cases, as we have suggested, the omissions may be excused for lack of evidence at the time. This plea may perhaps be urged in respect of one of the finest of English miniaturists, Andrew Plimer, who may almost be said to have been discovered by Dr. Propert. But, if this is true of one who is now looked upon as the rival, if not superior, of Cosway, it is not so of Cosway's successor, Andrew Robertson. Nor is there much excuse to be urged for the omission of Jean Sicardi, the painter of Louis XVI., and Sir William Ross, and many other English and foreign miniaturists whose names are by no means unknown, and much more important than the majority of the miniaturists of later days to whom Mr. Bradley has showed more favour.

But it is not only with regard to these later artists that this Dictionary is palpably imperfect. While giving him credit for research in out-of-the-way places, we fear that he has neglected some of the simplest sources of information—such, for instance, as Woltmann and Woermann's History of Painting. Here he might have found, amongst other names unnoted by him, those of Otto, a monk who wrote the Gospel-book of Lothair, now at Aachen; Wolfoz, a scribe of the ninth century; and a list of illuminators of the Menologium, or Sacred Calendar of the Vatican Library, which was written for Basil II. Two of these—Simeon and Pantaleon—should have been included in the third volume of his Dictionary, if it had any claim to exhaust existing material.

But these and other imperfections are not altogether the fault of Mr. Bradley, who seems to have been bound by the wishes of his publisher with regard to the size of the work. He does not appear to have been allowed enough space to have included all known names, nor enough time to have collected them all, and then made a selection from them, in order to fill his three volumes with the most important. The result of his labour can, therefore, be only looked upon as an essay in the direction of a complete dictionary of his subject—a work, learned and industrious, which will be of great use to future students, but one which in its present state should be consulted rather as an aid than an authority.

NOTES ON SPORT AND ORNITHOLOGY.*

THESE Notes on Sport and Ornithology have a double, though a melancholy, interest. They are not only pleasant, but instructive, reading, and they abound, besides, in incidental revelations as to the tastes and character of their author. It is evident that the unfortunate Rudolf was a prince of great promise and very considerable talent. If the book was really written by himself—and we have no reason whatever to doubt it—he had a good and easy literary style, with no little power of picturesque description. He inherited the family love for sport, and was an ardent naturalist, and especially an ornithologist. We can understand his facing exposure, hardships, and even dangers in the pursuit of game, as his father and Victor Emmanuel and many another monarch have done before him. But it is not every prince who, after a long day's shooting and dining generously, would leave the cigar and easy-chair for the pen and the escrutoire, and labour over writing up his diaries, instead of tumbling voluptuously into bed. Again, we are agreeably impressed by his extreme and unaffected affability. On his sporting and bird-nesting trip down the Danube three of his chosen companions were men of science of the middle classes, and he placed them on precisely the same footing of easy familiarity as his highborn cousin, Leopold of Bavaria. Indeed, he was content to sit modestly at their feet, as masters in his favourite studies. No doubt the great Hungarian landowners and nobles were only too glad to offer every civility and facility to their future sovereign. But Prince Rudolf always expresses his gratitude as if he really meant it for preserves thrown freely open to his party, and for the carriages, boats, and shooting-lodges which were placed at their disposal. It was only natural that his eagerness as a young sportsman should not unfrequently interfere with the methodical pursuit of scientific investigation. The chance of a tempting shot would lure him away from the spot where he had ambushed himself for special purposes of observation. He would get so excited in critical moments that at the flutter of an eagle's wing in the air or the rustle of some big game in a thicket his fingers would fumble nervously with the gun-locks or the rifle-sight would be dancing before his swimming eyes. But, on the whole, he managed to collect a wonderful deal of practical information on such congenial subjects as the habits and different varieties of the eagles, on the times and seasons of migratory birds. A sportsman the Prince was before all things; but he never stood on the dignity of his game. He would sooner shoot a carrion vulture than a royal eagle, when the one bird was of rarer species than the other; and in the East he was as keen after the jackals and hyænas as if they had been lions, or camelopards, or the rare black water-buck. From sundry passages in his notes on the East we see that the Prince was something of a poet, and had a highly sympathetic appreciation of romantic circumstances and surroundings. He will break out in a burst of rapture over the spectral shadows of columns and friezes falling over the glittering sands of a desert silvered by the moonbeams. But he is always a thoroughly honest traveller, nor does he care to "humbly" his readers by feigning an interest in matters as to which he was really indifferent. He knew little of archæology; and when he was treading the sacred soil of Palestine, his spirit was seldom stirred within him. He watches for wolves in the tombs of the Caliphs, beats up the gloomy corridors of the temples of the Pharaohs for the lurking hyæna, and when he pays a visit to the great pyramid of Cheops, his primary object is to get up a jackal hunt. As for the Barrage, he was bored to death with it, being obliged, in princely courtesy, to follow officious guides all over that triumph of French engineering. But he hints incidentally that it is not without its uses, as forming lakes and quiet shelter for the wild fowl.

The narrative of his trip of fifteen days down the Danube necessarily becomes somewhat monotonous, as the events of each day are noted in detail, and they often repeat themselves. Nevertheless, it gives a vivid idea of the characteristics of very peculiar scenery; of the animals that inhabit thinly-peopled districts scarcely accessible except by punting along narrow water-ways through malarious swamp and impracticable thicket; and of what was really an organized bird-nesting expedition, carried out en grand and en luxe. The Danube, which flows far beyond its ordinary banks in the spring, runs in many places in an infinity of shallow channels, forming archipelagoes of wooded or reedy islands, which fringe the swampy shores. So that Jokai the Hungarian novelist, with perfect propriety, the other day made one of these islands the scene of a dramatic story depending on an absolute solitude for its striking dénouement. The first of the most original descriptions by the Prince is that of a descent upon one of these islands with its heronry and its colony of cormorants. He describes the approach through the network of channels, where the navigation was extremely difficult:—"Great quantities of driftwood, driven out of the arms of the river, were floating about the main stream, and the fallen tree-trunks, which at this height of the water only showed their upper surfaces, might easily have been mistaken for crocodiles." Here he was specially impressed by the wild poetry of the scene as they pulled homewards to the steamer in the deepening twilight:—"In the east the leaden darkness was separated from the light of the departing day by a belt of orange, and was broken by a few bright isolated stars, while the low-lying woods and swamps, wrapped in blue vapours and feathery mists, assumed ghastly, indefinite shapes as they gradually melted into each other." And a very pretty and vivid description it seems to us to be. On the fifth day, adopting the American plan of cart-driving, he succeeded in making a close approach to a magnificent herd of red-deer. A propos to which, he remarks that the Hungarian red-deer are exceptionally large and fine, which he attributes to the quiet and the excellent feeding, which in course of generations have developed a characteristic and peculiar race. Eagles were perhaps his favourite quarry, and in fact the number he shot from first to last would have seemed inexcusable massacre, were not the noble birds comparatively common in Eastern Europe, and very capable of taking care of themselves. But on the seventh day he was greatly excited when going in pursuit of the great cinereous vulture which nested in the district he was shooting over. After sundry mishaps and disappointments owing to unforeseen accidents and shaken nerves, he succeeded in sending a heavy charge of buckshot into the breast of one of these birds. But rapture was speedily followed by disgust when he hurried up to his prize. The stench from the foul bird of prey was so intolerable that he had to beat a precipitate retreat of several paces; the skinning had, of course, to be done at secondhand; and the peasant told off to carry the creature to camp, though he must have been accustomed to evil smells, suffered sorely under the unsavoury load. But these vultures, which live entirely on carrion, do much useful scavenging work.

At Cairo the Prince was gratified even more by the sight of innumerable birds of prey in the very middle of the populous city than by the melodious cooing of the turtle-doves in the groves and gardens of the suburbs. But other and greater surprises awaited him when the Austrian Consul-General guided him out in search of sport. Beating one of the Khedive's gardens near the Obelisk at Heliopolis, they not only flushed cranes and woodcocks, but actually got glimpses of wolves, though the wolves succeeded in dodging them. They subsequently bagged wolves in the Fayoum, and there the Prince and his uncle, the Grand Duke of Tuscany, had some good sport with the lynxes, which reminds us much of a Highland "fox-hunt." The lynxes retreated to their fastnesses in the great cairns of ruins, from which they were bolted by the lithe and well-bred dachshunds, who seem to have been as "fell chieftains" on the vermin as any of Dandy Dinmont's Scotch terriers. Up the Nile there was night-watching for the wolves and hyænas over strong-smelling carcasses laid out by way of bait. Once the Prince gave a wolf a right and left, "the tough brute" being knocked over at the second shot. He shouldered it, and was carrying it towards the place where one of his companions was in ambush. Finding it somewhat heavy, he threw it down, whereupon the wolf gathered himself together and scrambled on to his legs. Fortunately the astonished sportsman had reloaded, and had another charge at his disposal.

The tour in Palestine must have been more exciting than agreeable. There was good sport to be had with the wild fowl in the affluents of the Dead Sea, and there were big boar to be found in the thickets that grew luxuriantly in the deep bottoms that were watered in the "swelling of Jordan." But the strength of the sportsmen was sorely tried, and their usually buoyant spirits sank below zero, for the leaden skies were gloomy in the extreme, and the atmosphere was frightfully oppressive and enervating. Putting the probabilities of low fever and dysentery out of the question, the camping out was by no means free from danger. Great scorpions lay thick under the stones; and, though there were preliminary searches each evening, by way of precaution, one of the attendants was severely stung. As they had bolted lynxes with dogs in the Fayoum, so they bolted lizards with fire in the Jordan Valley; and one wonderful and dragon-like specimen was secured measuring more than four feet in length. The Arabs positively refused to touch the repulsive animal, so that a litter had to be constructed for its transport to the encampment. Once they ran a porcupine to earth, but failed to dig him out; for the sun was scorchingly hot, and the Bedouins take more kindly to the spear than to the spade. En revanche they extracted a hymn-book from the hole, which the Prince presumes had been carried off by the porcupine, who, though tolerably omnivorous in his tastes, must have found the paper unpalatable. The Prince bore up pluckily against the intense heat and the enervating atmosphere, never sparing himself when sport of any kind was in the wind; but he had nearly paid dearly for what he tried to regard as pleasure. He had a severe attack of fever, which compelled him to put a premature end to the trip, and get on board his yacht as speedily as possible. We shall only add that there is a good chapter on Bear-shooting in Transylvania, with some interesting ornithological notes, by way of appendix.

NEW MUSIC.

FROM Messrs. B. Williams we have a schottische entitled "Winged Hours," by Ezra Read, which is bright and pleasing, although very simple. Mr. Michael Watson has managed to make a spirited march called "The Gladiators" out of a string of hackneyed phrases. "Mignon," by H. M. Millington, is a pretty valse of the usual type. "On the Broad Atlantic" is a song by Kingston Lisle, which has a certain go and a pleasant quaintness. "All the Same," by H. Trotère, is a song written more or less on the ordinary lines. There is the usual refrain in six-eight time at the end of each verse; but we are thankful to say in the verses themselves there is some variety, which makes it a pleasing drawing-room song. We like "Apple Blossoms," by Albert Fox, for it is a charming little song, short, and to the point. His "Morning Song" is very original, but could have been improved, either by being made shorter or by some contrast in one of the three verses; for continual unison between all the parts, vocal and instrumental, although effective in places, becomes monotonous when overdone. We should like to have a dance to Mr. Herbert Mullen's polka, "Hide and Seek," the tune is so merry and the rhythm so well marked. We have a vocal duet and two pianoforte pieces by Seymour Smith. The former is a pretty, humorous song, with a strong reminiscence of some of our piquant old English songs. One of the piano pieces, called "Doris," has the same successful old-fashioned ring; but in the other, called "The Old Gavotte," which is founded on a song by Lindsay Lennox, only the opening justifies the title, the rest being commonplace and of an essentially modern type. We are glad to find the part at which we most cavil, on p. 4 of the adaptation, is not in the original song; and, although there is too much repetition, the insertion by Mr. Seymour Smith makes it a patchwork, though put in, we have no doubt, from the laudable motive of making variety. "How I love thee," by Frederic Mullen, is what might be called a negative song, neither very pretty nor ugly, but rather attractive from its quiet simplicity. One short section of his "Liebestreue"—i.e. the latter half of No. 1—is decidedly original for a valse of modern days. We are most grateful for the least deviation from the beaten track. Of the two arrangements of the "Sérénade Orientale," also by Frederic Mullen, we decidedly prefer the duet between violin and pianoforte; there is a certain monotony in the piano arrangement which is avoided by the combination of two instruments. The Caprice which follows is bright and sparkling in both forms.

Dr. Bridge's humorous four-part song, called "Bold Turpin," published by Messrs. Novello, Ewer, & Co., is altogether an elaborate joke, even to the dedication to Mr. E. H. Turpin, the honorary secretary of the College of Organists, who has just been made a Mus. Doc. by the Archbishop of Canterbury. It is a bold attempt to suit the well-known ditty of Mr. Samuel Weller with equally comic music, and Dr. Bridge has been very successful in doing so, and yet steering clear of any vulgarity. We need not say, coming as it does from his pen, that it is thoroughly well written, besides being tuneful. We are specially taken by the contrapuntal scoring of the words "Sure as eggs is eggs, &c.," which we should have thought would have been the last to lend themselves to this treatment. Altogether from beginning to end it is very original, and quaintly picturesque.

LAURENTIUS SAGA.*

THE modesty with which this volume is given to the world should not disguise from us the fact that it is an exceedingly valuable acquisition to the English student of mediæval life. Not wishing, perhaps, to seem to puff his own work, Mr. Elton has laid little emphasis on the position which Laurentius Saga (or Lafranz Sögur, as it used to be called) takes in the development of Icelandic literature. But in reality its author, who doubtless was Einar Hafliðason, the Deacon, was the Shirley of the great school of saga-writers, and it is no small privilege to possess, for the first time in any modern language, what has been described as "the last of the Sagas." The religious and secular biographies, written in Iceland from the end of the twelfth to the end of the fourteenth century, form a connecting link between the old poetical and historical literature and the imaginative work of Continental writers in the middle ages proper. They are as yet hardly known in this country. They offer virgin ground to the translator. With the exception of what Dr. Vigfussen and Mr. York Powell have given in their Origines Islandicæ, we know of no fragments of the biographies which exist in English. The Secular Lives mostly take an earlier place than the Religious Lives, and one or two of them touch the classic age itself, and were begun during the lifetime of Sturla. The Religious Biographies are almost exclusively lives of early Icelandic Bishops, and their text is now conveniently collected in the edition of Vigfussen, Biskupasögur, published at Copenhagen in 1858, before that illustrious scholar found his way to England.

Among these Lives of the Bishops the earliest is a collection of biographies of the five first bishops of Skalholt, called Hungrvaka, or "The Hunger-Waker," because the nameless author hoped that the perusal of his book would make Oliver Twists of his readers, and arouse a hunger for more biography. The same writer is supposed to have composed about 1215 Páls Saga, which Vigfussen says is "a model biography, in which the book charms us even more than the subject," and which he compares to Carlyle's Life of Stirling. Some unknown cleric, possessing great historical genius, wrote the Life of Bishop Arni, and ended it abruptly in 1291. But the last, and by far the most amusing, of the Bishop-Sagas is that which was written about 1346 by Einar Hafliðason; it is this which Mr. Elton has translated. Einar, who was born about 1303 (Mr. Elton says 1307, but this can be proved impossible), was taught by Laurence while the latter was still only schoolmaster in Hólar, and when quite a young boy, in 1316, had attracted notice as the foremost scholar in the diocese. When Laurence came back to Hólar as bishop, Einar Hafliðason was one of those who welcomed him most lovingly; and the saga says of Laurence that henceforward "at high mass he always had the same deacon to minister to him; this was Deacon Einar Hafliðason, whom he loved beyond all his clergy, and accounted as his true and trusty friend." And it was in presence of the faithful Einar that the Bishop died at Hólar in the eleventh year of his episcopate.

The author of Laurentius Saga was, without question, one of the most gifted of his class. No other Bishop-Saga is put together so well as this, is so amusing throughout, or shows so much of the mere talent of the biographer. In the middle of the fourteenth century such skill as Einar Hafliðason possesses was rare indeed, and in fact we are not sure that this latest of the saga-men did not display qualities not again to be met with in the same form anywhere in Europe until the eighteenth century. His style, save for his too frequent historical digressions, is concise, rapid, and eminently to the point. He builds up the character of his hero with sobriety, and is apt neither to preach nor to be garrulous. He tells us that Laurence "himself admonished me to keep in mind whatsoever he related about the course of his life before he was bishop at Hólar," and "his life afterwards was," as we have seen, "well known to me, who was night and day in his service and lodging while he was bishop in Iceland until he died." Einar was, therefore, admirably circumstanced to be a Boswell, and his peculiar gifts enabled him to profit by his opportunities.

Laurence Thórarínson was born at a farm called Vellir, on the north coast of Iceland, in 1267. Some mild little miracles accompanied his childhood, and he was so clever that Jörund, then Bishop of the diocese of Hólar, the most northerly in Christendom, became his patron, and had him educated for holy orders. When he was twenty-five the Bishop gave Laurence a remote northern benefice; but in a year's time he came back to Hólar. The Bishop seems to have begun rather early to chafe under the superior scholarship and more perfect legal discipline of his protégé, and their friendship became strained. In 1294 Laurence got leave to go to Norway, where, at Bergen, King Eirik Magnusson received him kindly, and so did the Archbishop of Nidarós. But he found it impossible to keep peace with the heady and intriguing Norwegian ecclesiastics, and troubles began which made the life of Laurence a distress to him for many years. In 1304, when he was thirty-seven, Laurence was selected to go back to Iceland on a mission of a highly-painful and embarrassing nature, no less than to examine into the condition of the dioceses, and to report upon it to the Archbishop of Nidarós. Laurence foresaw the extreme unpopularity which this enterprise would bring upon him; but he regarded it as his duty to carry it out. Another man, one Björn, a person of very different calibre, was appointed co-visitor with him, and with equal powers. In the sequel it proved that Björn was ready enough to suggest to the Icelandic clergy that he was their friend; while the odium of reform fell on the upright and single Laurence. The most painful incident, of course, was the visit to Hólar, where his old patron received him with extreme coldness. This did not prevent Laurence from settling in his old home, and from doing his best to set the diocese in order. But, in August 1308, he was rather suddenly driven out of Hólar by the enmity of the Bishop, and set sail for Norway. Now comes a very picturesque passage. On landing at Throndhjem, Laurence was seized by order of the Chapter, and thrown into the repulsive dungeon called Gulskitni. The Canons had by this time practically deposed his old friend the Archbishop, and for six months things went ill with Laurence. His adventures are very graphically described. When he left the dungeon he was still imprisoned by order of the Official, or Archbishop's substitute:—

The Official proclaimed that the holy church of Nidarós should keep all the baggage that he had come with. A lodging was got for him; it had a window, so that he could read his Hours; and for his victuals there was brought him a little bread and one other dish, and a little small ale to wash it down; by night he had fetters on his feet; his feet swelled up, and the scurvy flew to his body. Icelanders were always coming to the window and talking with him; many men brought him food and drink; so that he had no lack for that. This was told the Canons, and they put iron spikes outside against the window, so that none should be able to talk with him. The woman named Thurid, daughter of Arni, by whom he had a boy Arni, often came to the window to him and brought him somewhat, as best she could, for food or comfort to him.

One day he contrived to be taken to the palace of the poor Archbishop, who, but for dignity's sake, was almost as powerless a prisoner as he, and the meeting between them is pathetically described. At last, the Chapter of Nidarós decided to send Laurence back to Iceland. He was put in chains on board a trader, stripped of all his goods, including his library of law books. "The traders, when they got to sea, straightway smote the fetters off Laurence, saying it was not the custom to carry folk in gaol or durance over the high seas." Oddly enough, Laurence's sufferings in Norway had pacified Bishop Jörund, who received him lovingly at first, although they very soon fell out again. In 1313 Jörund died, unreconciled. The next bishop, Audun, ruled in Hólar until he died in 1322.

Laurence was now in his fifty-sixth year, expecting nothing so little as promotion in the Church which had persecuted him. But his patience, his learning, and his piety were to be rewarded at last. The biographer tells how Laurence and another priest were riding through Langdale when they met a man who told them that Bishop Audun was dead, and that some other man, he thought of the name of Laurence, was elected in his stead. As they rode on, the other priest said, "Brother Laurence, art thou not that bishop-elect?" and the other replied, "Flout me not, it is likelier that the Canons have plucked me wholly out of the Church than that they have made me Bishop"; nor in spite of rumour upon rumour would he quit his humble stall in the choir until the Archbishop's letter came and all was certain.

Laurence was Bishop of Hólar for only eleven years. But he lived long enough to be a great and luminous figure in the troubled Church history of Iceland. His sorrows had but mellowed, they had not broken his spirit, and he ruled his diocese with a genial but with a very firm discipline. His own conduct was saintly, and Einar Hafliðason, who had the rare gift of describing what he saw, is able to make us realize very clearly the life in that strange arctic outpost of Christianity:—

The service of mass itself he delivered with heartfelt piety and with tears welling; and such compunction visited the bystanders, that in the low-chant there was more weeping and catching of breath to be heard from them than clear words. All the signs of the cross he made clearly and soberly, so that it could never seem too fast or too slow, but ever in due measure. After mass, when he came into the vestry, he sometimes rebuked the deacons and clergy for aught that seemed to him to have gone carelessly in the reading or chanting or other matters. He could not bear to see a deacon with a baggy blouse under his mass-vestments and dalmatic; that, he said to them, was how the mass-vestments and the stuff got torn. Likewise no priest or deacon durst have a cope beneath his long gown, having a choir-cope outside it; he told them to tear off the gear which was tightened down round them. He would never allow singing in two or three parts, calling it fiddlers' folly; no, they were to chant plain song, just as it was set in the choir-books. In the bell-ringing he chose to have the same rule as in the days of Bishop Jörund—namely, to go out about midnight in winter. He liked those of the clergy who had to go out to have a good nap after vespers.

He was only sixty-four years of age, but doubtless worn out prematurely by the hardships of his life, when, on the 16th of April, 1331, he passed away in his house at Hólar; and those who stood by bore witness that they had "never been by any man who departed so wonderfully from the world as Lord Bishop Laurence."

Mr. Elton has done his work of translation admirably. Without falling into any Wardour Street eccentricities, he has preserved the full flavour of the old-world story. Credit is due also to the publisher for the very pretty form in which the book has been brought out. We have but one criticism to make; the map is an absurdity, made to look like a mediæval chart, with a spouting whale and a ship in full sail. No one should ever play æsthetic tricks with a map, which is either quite clear and plain or a nuisance.

FRENCH CHRISTMAS BOOKS.

M. JULES LEMAÎTRE'S Dix contes (1) are so pleasant that we are chiefly inclined, in reference to them, to indulge the reprobate and ungracious wish that they had come out in a less luxurious form. They are things to read in armchair and with solace of tobacco, not stooping over a reading-desk or laboriously expanding arms to hold them. Nevertheless, the illustrations are very pretty in themselves, and do MM. Merson, Clairin, Lucas, and the other illustrators great credit. The Contes themselves are arranged in a sort of Légende des siècles fashion, beginning with a Persian tale of any epoch you like, and ending with a very pretty and melancholy legend of how Petit-Pierre heard the midnight Mass—the Mass after which there is no danger of requiring any new absolution—in “La Chapelle Blanche.” The first story—how a rich man gives charity, and finds that he has not been charitable after all—is a right agreeable tale, told in the softened Voltairian manner, and with points of romance such as this—“Et Ormuz lui fit la grâce de mourir dans la nuit même, très doucement”—in which M. Jules Lemaître, though nothing could have been further from his thoughts, was but paraphrasing a certain line of Mr. Browning's:—

Who knows but the world may end to-night?

The second, “Helle,” tells how a Greek maiden of high-souled thoughts and another maiden—very pleasant; but, alas! of thoughts not so high—were shut up to weave the sacred robe for Athene, and how very differently they took it. There is something a little Renanish (that is to say—but let us not say it) in “Myrrha,” which tells how a Christian bishop thrust a girl to the lions lest she should catch, or seeing that she had caught, the eye of Nero. And “Lilith”—who is not Lilith at all, but only a daughter of Herod and Mariamne—is disappointing. But “Les amoureux de la Princesse Mimi” is charming. The lovers were no less a person than Polyphemus (the real monster Polypheme, but humanized considerably and with two eyes), who was ten times the Princess's size, and Prince Thumb, who was one-tenth of it—a bad choice for the poor young lady. At last she chose Poucet, and Polypheme, the monster Polypheme, loyally abode her choice. But lo! when the spousals were just a-making comes me Prince Charming himself, and Mimi is in a terrible quandary. How it is solved the reader may find out; but as for the acts and sayings of the Princes Polyphemus and Poucet, he will say, if he is a right reader, with Aramis, on one of the greatest occasions of history (how sad, by the way, it is to think that M. Lemaître does not relish Dumas!), “Quant à moi, je trouve les choses que ces messieurs se disent fort bien dites et tout-à-fait dignes de deux gentilshommes.” And so shall we say of all that is said in this excellent book of tales.

If in this last sixty years wicked persons, neglecting the caution that ça porte malheur, have said evil things of Boileau (2), MM. Hachette have undertaken to purge this sin of our century by consecrating to him one of the most “monumental” editions that any poet has recently been honoured with. In a quarto mightier even than those of the “National” edition of his enemy and victor, Victor, with print as big and haply bigger, with huge and carefully executed planches hors texte, with elegant head and tail pieces, and, lastly, but by no means last, and, as it happens, first in order, with an introduction by his doughty champion, M. Ferdinand Brunetière, the great Despréaux comes once more before the world. Far be it from us to grudge him his splendour. For he was a very clever person, if a very disagreeable and also a very narrow-minded one, and we ourselves have perhaps said rather hard things of him sometimes. After all, if the legend of the turkey is true, there are great allowances to be made for him. The decoration of the book is perfect—we have seldom seen better executed plates, and the lady in the endangered sedan chair illustrating “Les embarras de Paris” is enchanting, and must cause to spring to any lips of sensibility the cry “Oh! why was I not there to help her out?” This is by M. Delort, who, indeed, seldom goes wrong in such matters. Pretty, too, is M. Hédouin's design for “Les femmes,” with the beauty holding out a careless hand to be kissed by one adorer, while others are waiting. M. Bonnat's idea of an idyl will give Mr. Horsley fits. But why is M. Cabanel's “Tragedy” engaged in the operation of biting her nails? M. Merson's abundant cuts for “Le lutrin” are as clever as they can be. Nor has cleverness abandoned M. Brunetière; it very rarely does. He is careful not to pitch the pipe too high in his praise, and adopts the safe line of arguing that, in faults and merits both, Boileau is French of the French. In which judgment, indeed, the best friends of the legislator of Parnassus (Alas! poor hill! with one peak quite gone, and the other trimmed to the size and shape of a sugar-loaf) may agree with his worst enemies.

“Sahib's” very amusing book of charges, coloured and plain, on the French navy and others (3) is bound in red, and fully admits that the Vengeur struck and asked for help before she sank, with the result that full half her crew were rescued by perfidious Albion. These two compliments to our nation may excuse a doubt on the author's part whether Nelson was a great man, and a passage of rire jaune about “Les rois de la mer—Grande Bretagne et co.” Certainly, whatever may happen in the future, we can afford this as far as the past goes. All through the book there is much amusing drawing, and, of course, designedly ferocious colouring, from the sketch of the “Éléphant” (landlubber) to that of the Artillerie de marine, respecting which a profane people “prétend qu'elle possède des chevaux, et même que ce sont des mulets, et de plus qu'ils sont en bois,” and that the only reason why it does not take the field with these adornments is that French naval operations are, unluckily, on too small a scale. The ancient caricatures are good, and the modern ones better, from the “captain of his own ship,” in full uniform and a nargileh, to “le commandant dans son blockhaus”—a respectable officer, in a kind of conning tower, with a whole engineer's shop of instruments round him. The drawings of ships, half faithful, half caricatured, are also excellent; and so is the first employment of shells, with a faultlessly-attired gentleman in feathered hat, trunk hose, and canons, or something like them, applying a red-hot poker to an extremely fleurdelizé mortar. The Sanspareil is a most terrible vessel, and Sainte-Barbe is quite a Bellona.

Those who have seen M. Toudouze's illustrations to Mérimée's Chronique de Charles IX will be glad to hear that he has begun a series of illustrations to the Waverley Novels, which no one could be better qualified to execute. The cuts in this edition are somewhat less elaborate than those to the Chronique, but still of much merit, especially those full-page plates, in which the artist has had more scope than in his vignettes and head-and-tail pieces. The translation by M. Robert de Cerisy is decidedly good as far as we have tried it.

M. Riffard's Contes et apologues (5), or at least this edition of them, would appear to be not exactly of to-day or yesterday, for the title-page bears the date of 1886. But they have not, we think, reached our hands before, and so pretty a book is always welcome whatever its date. The author, who has a very fine mastery of the irregular verse necessary to his subject, has called in M. Frédéric Régamey to pour over his pages, sometimes in colour, sometimes in black and white only, sometimes as separate plates, sometimes as vignettes, sometimes as head-and-tail pieces, sometimes in a kind of flood of design mixed with the typography itself, the most abundant quantum of illustration, we think, that we have ever seen in a book of verse. The designs are, of course, not all of equal value; but few are ugly, and some are very pretty indeed.

We noticed not very long ago the selection from the last ten years of M. Lafenestre's Livre d'or du salon (6), which M. Jouaust published as—in part—an Exhibition companion. The eleventh yearly issue now follows it. The place of honour is given to M. Dagnan-Riveret's “Bretonnes au Pardon,” and is certainly better deserved than that accorded to M. Friant's “La Toussaint,” which, in black and white at least, seems to us to come very near Sir John Millais's celebrated young man with the ulster and hatbox. M. Guay's “Poème des bois” (hide, blushing Horsley, hide once more thy face!) is much better, and “Le général Margueritte au plateau de Floing” is of the Vernet tradition, with which Frenchmen will not easily break. Then there is one of M. Chaplin's inimitable damsels “au nez voluptueusement retroussé,” but with rather more drapery on her than M. Chaplin usually leaves. Let us frankly admit that she seems quite ready to let it drop at any moment. An excellent landscape by M. Pelouse is the only other piece that it seems necessary to mention.

French publishers are hardly more renowned for anything than for the stately books of topography which they bring out, and M. Didot's La sainte Russie (7), with letterpress by the well-known Comte Vasili, and illustrations (four in chromolithography and hundreds in black and white) by all manner of artists, will not yield to any of them. The text of such a book is always hard to criticize, but we can safely say that all manner of things about Russia will be found here. The coloured plates represent a collection of Russian uniforms, in which the famous muffin-cap is contrasted with many other forms; two very beautiful series of “racial” types and costumes; and a charming plate of old Russian jewelry. As for the uncoloured plates, no man can number or describe them; they are of almost every possible sort and kind, and hours might be, and doubtless will be, spent in turning over and studying them.

CHRISTMAS BOOKS.

VIII.

THE scarcity this season of fairy-tales is something remarkable. The best that we have are collected reprints, and the little that is new cannot rank among the best. But if fairy-lore does not abound, something quite as delightful is supplied by the folklore of "Uncle Remus," a collection of whose "short stories, told after dark," appears with ample margins, handsome type, and Mr. Kemble's clever illustrations, under the title Daddy Jake the Runaway (Fisher Unwin). We never tire of hearing of "the Brer Rabbit" and the old times "when the animals used to talk and go on like people," as the little girl says in the charming prelude to these stories of "Uncle Remus." In Elf-Knights, by M. A. Curtois (Remington & Co.), the elfin folk are portrayed as a truly chivalrous people. There are gallant knights, beautiful ladies, distressed damsels, champions, tournaments, and all the material show of a twelfth-century romance in France or England. There is nothing especially elfin in the fantastic element of the story, though it is prettily imagined, and the incidents are varied and spirited. The Princess Inja (Simpkin, Marshall, & Co.) is a fairy-tale by B. C. B., that owes somewhat to Mr. Lewis Carroll; with some little invention, it has no notable grace or fancy, while its humour may be best described as dull fun. The story is printed on paper of a sickly greenish tint—the pale cast of moonlight, it may be—and Mr. J. W. Cawston's illustrations are very unequal. The figures of mortals are good; but Mr. Cawston's fairies are dreadfully suggestive of rejected ladies of the ballet. Voices of the Wind, by Rosa Annesley (Hirschfeld), closes our brief list of fairy phantasies, with a collection of pleasing sketches and stories of an allegorical or meditative kind, in which the human predominates over the ethereal. We have nothing in it, in fact, nearer the realms of the good people than the Banshee and the Spirit of Spring. Mr. Tring Pearce's elegant and truly decorative designs for The Wreath; and other Pastorals (Marcus Ward & Co.) show a decided affinity to French art contemporary with Boucher as applied to Sèvres china. His first drawing, "Ye shepherds, tell me, have you seen?" and the vignette frontispiece of Daphne, or Chloë, look like transcripts from some exquisite vase that have lost nothing of finish and quality by the process. Perhaps Damon, in "Hard by a Fountain," is too lackadaisical; but the pastoral sentiment is admirably suggested. Mr. Pearce is fortunate in his printer and publisher. The drawings are charming examples of reproduction in colour. The Robbers of Squeak (Marcus Ward), an amusing fable in verse of certain marauding mice who rob a poor widowed cat of her kitten, is illustrated by Miss A. M. Lockyer with admirable drollery. This is a capital book for children. Pretty pictures of birds and babies, dogs and dolls, healthy youngsters and their pets, alternate with bright and simple poems, in Harriett M. Bennett's Round the Hearth (Ernest Nister), one of several illustrated books printed by Mr. Nister in Nuremberg. The printing in colour is rich and harmonious. The John Gilpin Picture Book (Routledge) is a book for the nursery, without artistic pretensions, and full of the highly-coloured plates that attract the infant eyes. An American view of Father Christmas, Thomas Nast's Christmas Drawings for the Human Race (Sampson Low & Co.), is offered to the discerning British public, who are assured in a "Publisher's Note" that "Mr. Nast's hand, when dealing with current topics of the time, tips the flashing shafts of wit with morality." This assurance is only what might be expected from a country where everything must be "high toned" to be recognized at all. Despite this pleasing anticipation, we can find small trace in Mr. Nast's drawings of the flashing shafts or the "relentless humour." The majority of these "Drawings for the Human Race"—how like Mr. Barnum it is!—do not rise above the ordinary level of "Christmas Number" art.

For humour, not "humor," it is refreshing to turn to The Demon Cat, "a naval melodrama," by C. W. Cole and W. Ralston (Simpkin & Co.), an amusing story of an atrocious cat that made life unendurable on board one of H.M. ironclads, illustrated in colour by Mr. Ralston, with excellent spirit and vigour. Two capital stories about dogs may be noted in Mr. Frederick Langbridge's Two Conceited Puppies ("Home Words" Office), and The Story of a Poodle, by Lucy D. Thornton, with charming illustrations (Sampson Low & Co.); the first deals with the thrilling adventures of "Fop" and "Mop," the second is an autobiography, and one of the best of its kind. The Bairns' Annual, edited by Alice Corkran (Field & Tuer), continues its revival of old-fashioned woodcuts, with antiquated tales that should never be out of date, such as "Valentine and Orson" and "Fearless John, who could not shudder." Excepting the floral designs, which are fairly good, there is little to praise in Those were the Days (Dean & Son), a volume of feeble verses by Mrs. Tom Kelly, with insipid pictures by Tom Kelly, in drab cloth binding be-ribboned. The new volume of Scribner's Magazine (Warne & Co.) is, as usual, one of the most attractive of gift-books. Of the Leisure Hour and the Sunday at Home annual volumes we have only to note that these old favourite magazines fully sustain their reputation.

Miss S. L. Pumphrey is decidedly successful in the attempt to make a geological lesson interesting to the young. A Little Brown Pebble (Allen & Co.) is in fact a story-book, with much of the charm and entertainment that should belong to a fairy-tale, and yet it sets forth the chief geological facts concerning the making of the earth, the record of the rocks, and so forth, in a pleasing, intelligible style. A Modern Red Riding Hood, by C. A. Jones (Hatchards), is very distinctly related to its prototype. It is a pretty story, however, with a pretty heroine, whose "altruism" is perhaps a little excessive. Boycotted, by M. Morley (Remington & Co.), is not the stirring story the title seems to promise, though well written and interesting. An excellent story for girls, and one that reveals some power in characterization, is Severn-Side, by Edith E. Horsman (Edinburgh: W. P. Nimmo). The most notable feature of The Wild Ruthvens, by Curtis Yorke (Jarrold & Sons), is the extremely natural representation of children and their ways, and no sort of fidelity is more commendable and refreshing in what purports to be a "home story." Those fine old devices of the romancer, the buried treasure and the cryptic manuscript which is its key, are employed with so little skill by Mr. R. D. Chetwode in The Fortunes of the Quittentuns (Biggs & Debenham) that the story is like nothing so much as a wicked burlesque of Mr. Rider Haggard's She. But if the cryptogram is childish in conception, the treasure is proportionately immense and the voyage of discovery almost grandiose in its teeming absurdities. Miss Agnes Giberne's Number Three Winifred Place (Nisbet & Co.), a story veiled in melancholy, with the happy ending always welcome, is skilfully constructed, as all the author's stories are, and comprises a very taking picture of an old Colonel who has the charge of a little girl whose unquestioning faith in her protector is delicately suggested. Among books for boys we commend as wholesome and interesting reading A Warrior King, by J. Evelyn (Blackie & Son), a story of adventure in Africa; Sapelo; or, Child Life on the Tide-Water, by the late Mr. F. R. Goulding (Routledge); and Sam Silvan's Sacrifice, by Jesse Colman (Blackie).

FRENCH LITERATURE.

ALTHOUGH the death of M. Ernest Havet, at a somewhat advanced age, does not deprive France of a great man of letters, it deprives her of a scholar of considerable powers and of a man who did more than any one else to facilitate the study of one of her very greatest men of letters. M. Havet's theology may not have been satisfactory to those who hold that theology loses all interest, if not all raison d'être, when, as it has been said of M. Havet himself, it "accepts Christianity as a product of evolution." But M. Havet's work on the Pensées of Pascal ought to preserve his name. No one of the many students and editors of that remarkable book has done so much to substitute for the garbled, adulterated, higgledy-piggledy old version a version not, indeed, absolutely consecutive or luminous—for the circumstances of production made that impossible—but faithful, complete, and set in order as much as possible.

As we did last week so must we this—separating for consideration as "literature" from the mass of gift books three volumes which, indeed, as the excellent collections whereof they form part appear indifferently throughout the year, have only an accidental connexion with the Christmas and New Year issue of handsome volumes. Of former parts of two of them we have spoken often and recently. M. Vitu has naturally nothing but good to say of one of the least contentious in any sense of Molière's plays (1). M. L. Leloir's frontispiece is quite admirably composed, though some details of the execution do not please us so well. In the fourth part of M. Jouaust's Nouvelle Héloïse (2) M. Hédouin's plate of "Saint-Preux chez M. de Wolmar" is excellent, and the tail-piece to the volume showing the famous re-discovery of the inscription "Julie" is even better. The translation of the Oresteia (3) by M. Pierron is, rather contrary to M. Jouaust's habit, framed in red lines. You cannot translate Æschylus; you can least of all translate him in French; but M. Pierron grapples bravely with the impossible. M. Lemaitre's preface, though M. Lemaitre is a classical scholar, does not please us so much as some other things of his. M. Rochegrosse's head- and tail-pieces (let us anticipate the jest that it is rather difficult to make head and tail of them) are at least original, and not so sanguinary as remembrances of his famous "Andromaque" might suggest. But it would have been better if in the most effective situation of all—the death scene to the Agamemnon—he had not suggested that it was Clytemnestra, not her husband, who was tied up in a bundle.

Those who for some months past have heard much—perhaps too much—of Marie Bashkirtseff (4) should be obliged to M. Charpentier for printing, in two of the well-stored volumes of that admirable collection which contains many of the most precious things old and new in French literature, the young lady's journal from thirteen to four-and-twenty. There is a portrait—an exceedingly characteristic portrait—which, to a person skilled in studying the physiognomy of young ladies (and where, my dear Lady Blarney, shall we find a more delightful subject of study?), may almost dispense him from the necessity of reading a book which, though decidedly interesting, is also decidedly long. Marie Bashkirtseff, says the portrait (and the book says ditto), was a Minx. There are worse things than minxes—there are very many worse things than pretty and clever minxes. But she was a minx all through, and, if the “caricaturist Thackeray” (a thousand blessings on Mr. Howells for teaching us that word) had lived to see or hear of her, he would have hailed her as a gracious incarnation by Providence of his own Blanche Amory—Blanche Russified, Parisined, provided with Amielitish inspirations, and going so thoroughly into the spirit of her part as actually mourir de la poitrine. Personally we prefer Blanche herself; for Marie occasionally tries the style ennuyant, which Blanche never did. But there is little doubt that Marie was an avatar of Blanche. There is the same through and through falsity in both, the adoption of sham ideals out of books and fashions, and the attempt to live up to them, the vanity, the real selfishness and heartlessness, the affected sensibility, the dashes of pietism. Marie began at thirteen by falling frantically in love with a certain “Duc de H—” (very recognizable), whom she never spoke to, and writing down all about it. She went on at sixteen by being fallen in love with by a certain Cardinalino “A—” (also very recognizable), and writing down all about it. She ended by Bohemianizing herself among Parisian artists, and, as has been said, dying. The really amusing thing is that the persons who take her diary most seriously are sure to be exactly those who never have written or thought anything of the kind. Those who have, while they will only think with pity and kindness of Mlle. Bashkirtseff, will hardly consider her a rarissima avis, though she certainly was a remarkable specimen of a type.

M. Haraucourt (5) is, we doubt not, a clever man. But when you write a play “d’après Shakspeare,” the following insertion in the Trial scene gives furiously to think:—

LE VIEIL AVOCAT.
Pardon, quand Secundus me promet un sesterce...

(5) Shylock. Par E. Haraucourt. Paris : Charpentier.

Let us say nothing against this in its kind. But, if any composition of any human mind could be not even a thousand miles “après” Shakspeare, this is. We are really obliged to M. Haraucourt. Of late it has seemed as if—in, say, a hundred years, and by special grace—some of his countrymen might come to understand the Old Williams. He has refreshed us as to the impossibility.

We may recommend briefly one of the capital “vulgarization” books of MM. Hachette on the “deserts” of the world (6), in all its parts and under all their aspects. The subject is fascinating and the execution is good.

NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

SINCE the publication of the Great Lone Land no such vivid and stirring account of life in the Canadian North-West has appeared as Mr. John Donkin's Trooper and Redskin (Sampson Low & Co.) Some four years of active duty, during the lively times of Riel's rising, in camp or on the march, at remote outposts and on almost constant patrol work, naturally convinced Mr. Donkin, late corporal in the North-West Mounted Police, that the policeman's life is not altogether a happy one. The reflection, though it occurred to the writer of these cheerful and amusing recollections, was however but fleeting. It is plain that Mr. Donkin enjoyed a very good time, despite the rigour of the climate, and the harassing and at times monotonous service undergone in the wild territory between the North Saskatchewan and the Canadian Pacific Railroad, or on the Montana and Dakota frontiers, or on the Souris River. To one tolerably accustomed to “roughing it” in various capacities and in many parts of the world, the life must have more than gratified the desire for novelty and excitement. To be under canvas with the temperature at -62°F . is an experience hard to be imagined, and it is but one item of the hardships and perils set forth in Mr. Donkin's entertaining book. Worse than the extreme bitterness of the winter 1884-5, for an Englishman's first winter in Canada, as Mr. Donkin observes, is always the most endurable, were the blizzards and storms on the prairie and the sudden floods in camp. Then, too, the duties of the mounted police were often tedious and exhausting, without any compensating thrill of danger. Guarding prisoners or escorting Indians who had broken from their reserve was anything but pleasant “relief,” after exciting brushes with Indians and disaffected half-breeds. Of Louis Riel and his followers Mr. Donkin gives a very interesting account. He shows how completely the “little Napoleon” of the North-West failed to make the most of his opportunity after that little affair of the ambush at Duck Lake and the evacuation of Fort Carlton. By the aid of the excellent map provided, the operations of troops and police during this crisis may be easily followed. Every reader, we are confident, will feel grateful for the happy impulse that prompted Mr. Donkin to desist from “breaking” the virgin prairie as an agriculturist, and “take a turn at soldiering again.”

Professor Blackie, in A Song of Heroes (Blackwood & Sons), treats an inspiring theme with becoming enthusiasm in a grave chant arranged in ballad cantos, with occasional lapses into a familiarity of style, if the colloquial manner of the poet may be so termed, that is not generally associated with epic schemes. The heroes chosen represent, in three cantos, the old world, the middle ages, and the new world. Each hero has his song, and almost all the songs have the opening formula, “I will sing of.” Here, for samples, we give “Alexander” :—

I will sing of Alexander,
Macedonia's peerless boy,
In whose veins the blood of heroes
Ran like rivers in their joy.

“Luther” :—

I will sing of Saxon Luther,
Who from lowly peasant-home,
With brave word of truth forth-thundered,
Shook the throne of mighty Rome.

“Cromwell” :—

I will sing of English Oliver,
Who, when kings were led by fools,
Led by fools, and served by brainless
Pedants trained in priestly schools, &c.

There is, we admit, a simple Bardic effect in this, which better suits the subject than the grandiose invocations of ordinary poets. The result, as a whole, is much less inspiring. The attempt to sing of heroes, as Professor Blackie sings them, is, we fear, more heroic than the song.

People interested in provincial dialect “as she is spoke” may be amused and instructed by Mr. S. S. Buckman's John Darkes' Sojourn in the Cotteswolds (Chapman & Hall), a series of sketches in Gloucestershire speech illustrating old customs and old speech now rapidly dying. The agricultural pictures suggested in the sketches of “The Ram Fair,” “The Harvest Home,” “The Old Shepherd,” and others, are capital for fidelity and clearness. The author's concluding anecdote reveals the character of the book, and shows the advantage of knowing the vernacular. Passing some quarries with a friend one day, the latter inquired of a boy, “Can you please inform me to whom these quarries belong ?” “Dunno,” was the answer. Then the author interposed. “I say, nipper, who do the volks teak thaay quarrs off ?” “Oh,” replied the boy, "Mr. So-and-So, as do live down to thuc big house," and more than the needful information was at once forthcoming.

For the increasing number of tourists and invalids Mr. A. Samler Brown has written a handy guide, Madeira and the Canary Islands (Sampson Low & Co.), which is as useful as it is timely. Mr. Brown's excellent little book comprises all the information that travellers need, with a series of legible maps, a useful bibliography, and tables of steamship routes, fares, hotels, and other indispensable matters. The descriptive and historical sections of the book are carefully compiled, and thoroughly readable.

From Blackwood's Magazine we have a varied and interesting instalment of reprinted articles of voyagers in the fifth number of Travel, Adventure, and Sport (Blackwood & Sons). The anonymous episode of adventure, "A Night's Peril," is worthy of the golden prime of Maga.

"The faculty," as the medical profession is humorously called, has inspired much fiction of the sensational kind, and Mr. George Manville Fenn's Three People's Secret (Simpkin & Co.) is decidedly among the more notable in the lengthy catalogue. At the present rate the "O. U. R." books, of which this is a fresh example, will prove a formidable gallery of horrors.

Anybody who wants to know all about "thought-reading" and how it is done will find a cheap and easy solution in Mr. Sid Macaire's Mind Reading or Muscle Reading (Simpkin & Co.) Reading of another kind, the platform or the "penny," is supplied by Garry's Elocutionist (Marcus Ward & Co.), of which we have the fifth edition. Here is rich provision for the reciter, and in Mr. Rupert Garry's Elocution, Voice and Gesture (Marcus Ward & Co.), new edition, is the key to success. Mr. Garry's "Annotated Pieces" rival the highest flights of Mr. Anstey in this difficult art. On such questions as the nice conduct of the thumb or an outward palm, the striking of the left side with the right hand, and so forth, when "Hamlet's Soliloquy" is to be delivered, Mr. Garry is an unfailing authority.

Choice Bits from British Wits (Diprose & Bateman), a collection of extracts from Douglas Jerrold, Sydney Smith, Theodore Hook, Barham, and other humorists, comprises of necessity some excellent matter and some neither excellent nor witty.

We have also received that old-established annual The British Almanack and Companion for 1890 (Stationers' Company); The Charities Register and Digest, third edition, with Introduction, by C. S. Loch (Longmans & Co.), and a new edition of Mrs. Gilchrist's Mary Lamb, "Eminent Women" Series (Allen & Co.)

SIR ERASMUS WILSON, F.R.S.

Late President of the Royal College of Surgeons of England,

Writes in the Journal of Cutaneous Medicine :

"The use of a good Soap is certainly calculated to preserve the skin in health, to maintain its complexion and tone, and prevent its falling into wrinkles.....PEARS is a name engraven on the memory of the oldest inhabitant; and Pears' Transparent Soap is an article of the nicest and most careful manufacture, and one of the most refreshing and agreeable of balms for the skin."

MR. JOHN L. MILTON,

Senior Surgeon, St. John's Hospital for the Skin, London.

From the Hygiene of the Skin.

"From time to time I have tried many different Soaps, and I have now, after Fifteen Years' careful trial in many hundreds of cases, both in Hospital and Private Practice, no hesitation in giving my verdict to the effect that nothing has answered so well, or proved so beneficial to the skin, as PEAR'S SOAP."

DR. TILBURY-FOX,

Late Physician to the Skin Department, University College Hospital, London.

"PEAR'S SOAP is the best Soap made."—Vide Tilbury-Fox on the "Skin," p. 509.

MR. JAMES STARTIN,

Surgeon and Lecturer at St. John's Hospital for the Skin, London, Successor to the late Mr. James Startin.

"As to the soap you should use: Having made innumerable experiments with all the best known Toilet Soaps, both of English and Continental Makers, my experience as regards PEAR'S SOAP endorses that of the late Mr. James Startin, Professor Erasmus Wilson, Dr. Tilbury-Fox, and similar writers; I have invariably found it perfectly pure, and the most efficacious in health and disease, and hence I recommend it to patients in preference to all others."

THE SIN OF JOOST AVELINGH.

A Dutch Story. By MAARTEN MAARTENS. 2 vols. crown 8vo. 12s.

"Unquestionably a good piece of work, with clear delineation, accurate pictures of life, and abundance of local colour."—Athenæum.

"It was reserved for the author of this story to give a new interest to the crime of murder as a source of fiction. The work is so good that it will doubtless find many readers here."—Scotsman.

"It is impossible to read these pages without being vividly impressed by the writer's sombre imagination and dramatic power. To say that Maartens will remind many readers of Hawthorne is to pay him a high compliment, but it is a compliment which is not undeserved, and though he has been so far unknown in England, 'The Sin of Joost Avelingh' is a book which can hardly fail to awaken a feeling of interest, curiosity, and anticipation."—Manchester Examiner.

"Though the scene, the personages, and the 'local colouring' all belong emphatically enough to Holland, the theme of the tale has an interest as wide as humanity itself. The story is strongly told. Joost Avelingh is a thoughtful and consistent character study."—Scottish Leader.

"Well conceived and well sustained. The plot is ingenious, the analysis of character takes a subtle range. Striking epigrams abound."—Rod and Gun.

THE BLACK BOX MURDER.

A Story. BY THE MAN WHO DISCOVERED THE MURDERER.

Crown 8vo. 6s.

"Interesting and readable; will carry the reader lightly over the weary miles between London and Peterborough."—Saturday Review.

"May be recommended to those who like detective stories as a good specimen of the class."—Athenæum.

"A really clever and well thought out example of the literature of crime. One of the best books of the kind that has been recently published."—Scottish Leader.

"May be safely recommended to all who delight in a tale of horror."—Literary World.

"A capital story."—Glasgow Herald.

"Considerable skill is shown in working out the idea."—People.

"An exciting story; the mystery is well maintained to the close."—St. Andrew's Citizen.

REMINGTON & CO., HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, W.C.

By SAMUEL WADDINGTON.

Fcp. 4to. 4s. 6d.

"Good sonnets, indeed, are so rare, that the writers of them could almost be counted on one's fingers. Mr. Waddington was already one of this small number before the present volume appeared, but many among these hundred sonnets will strengthen his claim to the distinguished place he has attained."—York Herald.

"Both as a writer of sonnets and an authority on the subject, Mr. Waddington has done good work. The present collection is worthy of his reputation as a scholar and a poet. His sonnets possess the not common distinction of clearness of expression. They reveal also a sense of form and an avoidance of mere sonority of language that are exceedingly rare in the sonnets of the day."—Saturday Review.

"Mr. Waddington's favourite method of presentation is sculptural rather than pictorial. . . . Few will be found to refuse admiration to the fine seriousness, the moral enthusiasm, and the serenity—of strenuous earnestness rather than of cold indifference—which are everywhere the distinguishing notes of these poems."—Academy.

"Mr. Waddington writes a sonnet with the skill and grace of a poetical virtuoso. . . . the thought is high, the feeling simple and sincere in them all."—Scotsman.

LONDON: GEORGE BELL & SONS, YORK STREET, COVENT GARDEN.

On SATURDAY, JANUARY 4th, 1890, WILL BE

AND ART.

Price SIXPENCE Weekly.

THE SPEAKER will be a Weekly Journal of Politics, Literature, Science, and Art, and the aim of its conductors is to secure for it a position in the front rank of English journalism. With this object the Editor has organised a staff of writers, including many men of established eminence in the world of letters, as well as specialists who will be able to treat with unquestioned authority the scientific, artistic, and economic problems of the day. The Editor hopes to be able to inspire his readers with the conviction that none but writers possessing exceptional qualifications for their task will be invited to discuss the questions with which it is intended that THE SPEAKER shall deal.

In politics THE SPEAKER will advocate the great principles which are common to all sections of the Liberal Party,—Free-trade, the extension of a truly national system of education, the development of the principle of local self-government, and the maintenance of individual and popular rights under the protection of the law; and it will at the same time give its strenuous support to a policy of conciliation towards Ireland, and to the attempt to govern that country rather with than against the consent of its people.

Foreign Affairs will be dealt with by men who have acquired a practical knowledge of the questions of international policy which affect the peace and prosperity of the civilized world. In connexion with this department of THE SPEAKER, a new feature in English journalism will be introduced, in the shape of signed letters from correspondents in all the principal capitals of Europe, America, and Australia. In almost all cases these correspondents will be men of affairs who are actively engaged in the government of the respective countries from which they write.

To literary news and criticism THE SPEAKER will devote special attention, great care being taken to keep this department of the journal free from any suspicion of favouritism on the one hand and of sectarianism or narrow-mindedness on the other. The contributors whose aid in literary criticism has already been promised include many men whose names need only be mentioned in order to satisfy the public that in this department, at all events, THE SPEAKER will be inferior to no other journal in the world. Great care will be taken to ensure prompt notices of new books; whilst one special feature of the literary portion of THE SPEAKER will be the appearance of a causerie from the pen of a well-known essayist and critic, in which literary news and personal information on literary topics will be blended with criticism.

Scientific questions will be dealt with by men who are themselves distinguished in scientific research; Art, Music, and the Drama will be handled by recognised authorities, whilst special attention will be paid to the movements of the Money Market, and the condition and prospects of our Commerce and Industry.

Although as a rule the articles in THE SPEAKER will be anonymous, the Editor will publish from time to time signed contributions from men and women whose names will add weight to their writings, and whose opinions on questions of the day the public will be eager to learn.
